Dear Mr. Murrow:

I think I'm safe in saying that you work just as hard for the top dollars of your income as for those in the lower tax brackets. But do they work as hard for you?

Let me answer that with an illustration.

Suppose, for instance, that your income is such that the top $24,000 of it is subject to a 70% Federal tax. After giving the government $16,800, suppose you invested the remainder of $7200 at 5%, which would provide an annual yield of $360. This $360 of income would also be taxed at a rate of 70%, so the net yield on the original $24,000 would be $108.

That represents a return of less than one half of one per cent!

Is it any wonder that more individuals every year are turning to tax-sheltered investments? And especially to participations in exploratory drilling for oil and gas because there they enjoy the greatest tax advantages of all.

Drilling for oil is a perfectly ethical and entirely legal way of reducing to a minimum the devastating effects of income, gift and inheritance taxes. It can also be the basis for an ideal retirement program.

I am hoping that you can arrange to see me during my next trip North, at which time I'll bring with me some facts and figures that I believe you'll find extremely interesting, whether you decide to become an investor Associate or not.

I'll be writing you again shortly.

Sincerely,

William D. McCabe

Just a line to thank you for your patience and fortitude in giving me so much of your time in the middle of the most hectic schedule.

You were forthright, lucid, and provocative and, for me at least, it was a most interesting hour. The results will appear in the JUNE issue of McCALL's magazine, which will be on the stands on May 25th.

Seven State Schools to Open Today on Integrated Basis

ter Academy Inc., a new private school, indicated last week it may continue to operate.

No Indication of Drop-outs

There were no reliable indications of how many of the white pupils in the Norfolk and Arlington integrated schools may choose to drop out and seek tuition grants.

An Arlington school official said he knew of no pupils who plan to drop out.

For those who do seek tuition grants, nonsectarian private schools are in short supply. Most of the private schools in Virginia are affiliated with religious groups, deriving some support from them. As the tuition law is written, the state grants can't be obtained in order to attend these schools.

However, the distinction between sectarian and nonsectarian is vague and nominal in some cases. Official determinations of status might permit some of them to accept state tuition-grant pupils.

Of the relatively few private schools that are unquestionably nonsectarian, most are already filled. Furthermore, their tuition fees are generally higher than the maximum grant of $250 a year to be allowed under the state law.

No Classes in Norfolk

No classes will be held in the six Norfolk schools to be integrated today. But in Arlington a normal school day operation is scheduled at Stratford. When the four Negro pupils show up, two of them will be placed in one seventh-grade section, and two will be put in another seventh-grade section. Stratford Junior High, with a present enrollment of 1,076 youngsters, has 12 seventh-grade sections.

This will be the first time Negro pupils have ever attended public school classes with whites in Virginia. One Negro youth did take a shop class by himself in Arlington's Washington and Lee High School about 10 years ago under the old separate-but-equal doctrine.

Negro pupils have been attending classes with whites in the parochial schools of the Richmond Roman Catholic diocese for the past four years. Sixty Negroes were admitted to 14 of the diocese's schools in 1954, where they amounted to 1.1 per cent of the total enrollment of 5,228 in the 14 schools.

Whether that percentage has changed much isn't known because no census by race has been taken in the schools.

The integration experience by and large was orderly in the parochial schools. "We've had a couple of little growing pains, as you might expect," said the superintendent, the Very Rev. J. Louis Flaherty. "But they didn't amount to a row of beans."

Integration isn't unheard of in Virginia state universities either. There has been a handful of Negroes in graduate divisions of the University of Virginia since 1950. For the past several years, there have usually been two or three attending the Medical College of Virginia.

Police preparations for Norfolk and Arlington today varied in detail, but the essence in each place was a squad of specially trained policemen who will be deployed near the schools.

In each place police officers had announced that disorders will not be tolerated and that disturbers will be arrested.

No Show of Force

Norfolk's director of public safety, Calvin H. Dalby, said last week that the city won't show police force around the schools today. Undoubtedly there will be police in the vicinity of the schools, whether they are apparent or not.

An unknown number of state policemen will be ready to help local police today, if needed. All the superintendent of state police, Col. C. W. Woodson, would say about the situation was that his department was taking "such action as necessary to continue our long-established policy of consistent and unrelenting enforcement of the law."

It seemed likely that federal law enforcement personnel would be on hand as observers of any disorder. There have been hints that state authorities would observe the observing federal men. Some Southern officials disapprove of the role played by federal investigators in the Litttle Rock disorders.

Dear Sir,

My name is James J. McClellan. I live at 2824 East 43 Street Brooklyn 3, New York. I am originally from Pittsburgh Pennsylvania. First Mr. Murrow I would like to tell you about my personal life and then explain the reason for this letter. I was born in Pittsburgh on March 29, 1936. I have nine brothers and sisters. My Father has been a laborer in a brick yard for 40 years. My childhood was a poor one, but I cannot complain, those were the happiest days of my life as I look back. I attended Westinghouse High School in Pittsburgh and there I established a good academic record along with a fine athletic record. I recieved several athletic scholarships after my graduation from high school. I choose Saint Francis College of Loretto, Pennsylvania because it was near my home Pittsburgh and my best friend Maurice Stokes was attending there, and in my own opinion I knew it was a fine liberal arts Catholic college. I started to attend Saint Francis in September of 1954 and I played basketball for my keep. I majored in sociology and minored in english. I traveled a lot playing ball, and in the summers I traveled also, within the United States. I have meet all sorts of people and I have a great love for my fellow man and I except my fellow man because to me no matter how mean and hatefull a man can be, he remembers true love and craves it from his fellow man.

In the summer of 1955 I moved to New York to work. I worked as delivery boy for a cleaning concern, it paid my expenses and left a little change for spending and as a result I got what I wanted out of coming to New York and that was to meet men from just about every walk of life. I went back to school in September of 1955 and it was that year I realized I would have to write if I wanted to have any happiness in life. Mr. Murrow I have a greater motivation than happiness for writing I want to help my fellow man with my pen. I know I have the skill Mr. Murrow and the faith in God, to me material gain means very little, we all come here with nothing and I have yet to hear of one case were someone had taken material gain with them. I realize money is something man has to have to exist in our way of life, but to me it has been set to far ahead of the finer things that we should practice. Man should thrive for perfection in living together, to try to find a oneness in the world. With my pen I would like to bring to man a more sound and godly goal other than material gain.

I graduated from Saint Francis in June of 1958. I am now teaching at Saint Jovita ~~High~~ Elementary School part time and working at the New York City Youth board at night. The work I do with the youth board is controlling anti-social street gangs.

Mr. Murrow I am a negro, while at Saint Francis I became a convert into the Catholic Church. I am single, but I plan on getting married this summer.

I realize I have given you just a vague picture of myself and at this point you are probably wondering why. Mr. Murrow I have tried to enter the writing field at any position. I want to start in this proffession anywhere. I want you to help me Mr. Murrow to me you have done more for America and the world than any other man in your proffession

I would like to set and talk with you and let you judge what I have to offer my fellow man at this time, if this is impossible, I would like for you to help me find a job at any level in your profession. I hope you haven't found me to forward Mr. Murrow. I have looked at the bottom for a job and nothing has opened for me in four years. So I decided to write the top and to me Mr. Murrow you are the top.

I thank you very much for reading this letter Mr. Murrow and excuse the mistakes at this time I am holding my eyes open with one hand and writing with the other.

Sincerely Yours,

James J. McClellan

Dear Doctor Murrow:

How would you like to have the opportunity to make a really worth-while business-diversification investment? particularly one that will establish you as one of the world's four prime producers of commercial BORON chemicals? Your generous outlay, in construction of recovery and refining facilities, will yield a lifetime of steady and expanding good-paying operations in the profitable production of $NaHCO_3$, Na_2CO_3, Na_2SO_4, KCl, plus Lithium and Bromine minerals, besides $Na_2B_4O_7$ and other BORON compounds.

I will be happy to help you acquire a very large productive area, comprehending between 4,000 and 13,000 acres of easily proven mineral land; having rail and highway transportation, gas for fuel and electricity for power. Don't you think you owe it to yourself to have one of your geologists, or engineers, make an examination; or at least have a close look at this highly remunerative proposition?

Will the customary 5% be too much to ask for my valuable services in this regard, when accepted as an interest in the venture, in lieu of cash?

I am glad to be in position to provide the most in dependable, prompt, efficient and profitable service for you.

Sincerely yours,

April 1959

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Some weeks ago I joined with a group of fellow citizens in inviting you to participate on a Commission of Inquiry into a case which has troubled many thoughtful persons. I refer to the Rosenberg-Sobell trial. The other signers were Malcolm P. Sharp, Harold C. Urey, Francis D. Wormuth, Horace M. Kallen, Bernard D. Davis, and Paul L. Holmer.

In view of the questions raised in many of the replies I have received, I feel it would not be amiss to answer some of the questions that I know have arisen in the minds of many recipients of our February letter.

Our February letter was sent to nearly 400 eminent Americans. To our knowledge, the majority of these people have not studied, have not been spoken to, and have expressed no public opinion in reference to the case.

While I and the other signers of the February letter do have an opinion that justice was not done in the case, (with the exception of Bernard Davis who was unable to study the merits of the case, but did feel that an inquiry was necessary and therefore signed the letter) we do not want to have an Inquiry Commission which starts with such views. We who would like to see Sobell freed would gain nothing from a favorable report from such a group. We are seeking a truly independent and fairminded Commission which will dig deep into the many aspects of this case.

Why do we propose this Commission? (1) A nagging doubt is in the minds of many people throughout the world about certain aspects of the Rosenberg-Sobell case. (2) We, and you, believe in the inherent justice of the institutions making up our form of government and do not wish them suspect. (3) The United States Supreme Court never expressed itself on the merits of this case. (4) The truth, as history shows, is not always attained by the criminal trial. (5) Finally, in the ideological battle which will develop in the Commission with some of the best minds in the country participating, truth will come out victorious.

In some of the replies to our letter I have been asked what the Commission will do, how it will function. I do not know and I will have no say in it. But I will give you my ideas--for what they are worth.

I do not view the Commission's work as a second trial, though I do believe the trial transcript should be summarized and analyzed. Nor do I see it as a lawyer's job. As to the qualifications of non-lawyers for the job, I would suggest that (1) our legal system is built upon the competence of jurors to decide matters within the legal sphere, and (2) the Inquiry only starts from, but is far from limited by, the narrow confines of the trial transcript.

The Commission might examine the case from a number of points of view. To name a few: the historical and sociological; a psychological evaluation; the moral aspect of the case. Such a plan would permit each member to work in that field in which he is most interested or competent. If the Commission were to divide its work up, this would be helpful for those who are concerned about the amount of time the Commission will take from their already busy lives.

Finally, I offer the suggestion that everything important that has been written or said on the case be gathered for examination. The Commission might ask some people or organizations to present their views on the case, pro and con.

I am sure that the members of the Commission will have many ideas on how best to proceed. The important thing here is that prospective members should understand clearly that it is they who will decide the procedure, scope, amount of work, plan of work, and all such matters.

If you think the work of the Commission would be worthwhile but you, yourself cannot serve, would you suggest someone who might serve, as it were, in your place?

I do recognize that many of the recipients of this letter might be willing to serve if they know the names of the other members of the Commission. I, therefore, solicit a definite answer that you will serve, on the condition that you approve the other members. We will then furnish you with the names of others, who, like yourself, have a given conditional approval. You may then give me your final answer.

I shall look forward to hearing from you.

Sincerely,

Peter McCormack

P.S. Since writing you originally, a statement on the Sobell portion of the case by a group of distinguished Americans has come to my attention. I am enclosing a copy for your information.

The following is the full text of the independent plea for Morton Sobell which was reported in the New York Times on February 22, 1959:

A STATEMENT ON THE CASE OF MORTON SOBELL

The undersigned are American citizens who believe that the sentence of Morton Sobell should now be commuted. Sobell was convicted of conspiring with others to transmit to the Soviet Union writings and information relating to the national defense of the United States and was sentenced on April 1, 1951 to serve thirty years in Federal Prison.

Morton Sobell was tried with Julius and Ethel Rosenberg, who were convicted of espionage in connection with the atomic bomb and who were sentenced to death and later executed. Sobell, however, was never implicated in any way with involvement in the atomic espionage for which the Rosenbergs were convicted. This fact was confirmed by the judge who sentenced Sobell.

This statement is not concerned with the Rosenberg conviction. The undersigned are and consistently have been convinced anti-Communists. None are associated with any organization, committee, or group of any kind concerned either with the case of the Rosenbergs or that of Sobell, nor are any of the undersigned connected in any way with Morton Sobell or any members of his family. After study of the case, we believe that the following considerations warrant a commutation of the very heavy sentence Sobell is now serving.

1. Sobell was never implicated with atomic espionage for which the Rosenbergs were convicted.

2. The charges against Sobell, supported mainly by the testimony of one man, Max Elitcher, were that he had solicited information, and had on one occasion taken something which looked like a can of film to Julius Rosenberg. No specific item of information supposed to have been secured by him or transmitted by him to anyone else is specified in the record. The case against him, therefore, is vague in content and slender in proof. The possibility that a trip to Mexico which he and his family took should be construed as flight cannot be ignored, though it is subject to various interpretations.

3. Whether or not the judge and prosecution made sufficient efforts to provide a fair trial, we ought to recognize that the emotions surrounding the trial of the Rosenbergs and the fact that Sobell's case was tried with theirs made it difficult to separate the two charges and the evidence introduced to support them respectively.

4. Sobell has already served, with good conduct, nearly eight years in prison, six of them in Alcatraz.

5. As Americans we are fully aware of the threat of communism to our freedom and way of life. Any attack on that freedom from without or within must be resisted. Nevertheless, one of the factors which makes that freedom so precious is its capacity to practice a disciplined and humane administration of justice precisely in those cases where emotions are aroused which make it difficult to remain objective about the merits of a specific case. We believe a commutation of the Sobell Sentence would demonstrate our national faith in that freedom.

COLLEGE OF BUSINESS ADMINISTRATION

February 14, 1958

Mr. Edward T. McCormick, President
American Stock Exchange
86 Trinity Place
New York 6, New York

Dear Mr. McCormick:

The student chapters of eight professional societies representing close to one thousand students of the College of Business Administration of Drexel Institute of Technology will conduct their annual College of Business Administration Convocation in April of this year. Business leaders and representatives of the senior professional societies will spend the day on campus to discuss with our students a major segment of American commerce and industry. In the four years immediately past, our Convocations have been devoted respectively to the Air Transport Industry and the Electronic Data Processing Industry. This year we propose to review the field of finance, and devote special attention to the role that the individual plays in relation to the overall industry.

Our Convocation is highlighted by the presentation of our College of Business Administration Award to a distinguished representative of the industry being reviewed. Past recipients have been, Mr. Earl Dallam Johnson, one-time Undersecretary of the Army and president of Air Transport Association; Mr. Edward R. Murrow; Mr. Henry Luce: and last year General Douglas Mac Arthur, Chairman of the Board of Remington Rand.

It is my pleasure to inform you that the student professional societies were unanimous in their selection of you as the outstanding candidate for the 1958 Business Administration Award. Their selection of you was influenced both by the aggressive position which you hold within the field of Finance as well as your reputation for fair-play.

We are, therefore, extending this written invitation with sincere hope that you can be with us on one of the following two days in April when we schedule our Convocation - 17th or 24th. The morning program will open with a film explaining the functions of a stock exchange. Following the film, the Award will be presented and the recipient usually speaks on the general topic of the field being reviewed. Immediately following the remarks of the recipient, a panel of experts within various phases of the field of finance will be introduced to the students assembled. This introduction, of course, will be supplemented by individual remarks relative to the topic which each member will discuss during the afternoon session. There will be a luncheon at noon in honor of the Award recipient. The afternoon session will concern itself with the more specialized lines of finance and discussion groups will be headed-up by the previously mentioned panel. In this manner it is possible to satisfy the various interests within the general field of discussion. The day's activities will culminate with the ending of these discussion groups.

We shall particularly like to hear you discuss the role of the individual in today's market and the benefits which he can achieve by participating in America's growth. It would not be necessary for you to attend the afternoon session although you would indeed be welcome if your schedule will permit. I can be reached through Dr. Bonnell's office, the vice president of the Institute, telephone EVergreen 2 - 6200.

We hope very much to hear that you can accept this invitation to be our recipient of the Business Administration Award and speak to the business students of the Institute as well as being our honored guest at the luncheon.

Sincerely,

January 2, 1959

Dear Ed:

As you probably know, the Editorial Pages of many great newspapers in the United States have already begun a welcome clarification of the changed image of Argentina, in a constructive preparation for the forthcoming historic visit of President Arturo Frondizi to Washington and six other American cities, starting on January 19th.

Typical is this comment from The New York Times on the last day of '58: "The procession that saw ten European countries restore their currencies to full, or almost full convertibility as the week began has now been joined by a new recruit. President Frondizi of Argentina announced that, acting on the assurance of outside credits in the amount of $329 million, his Government proposed to remove the country's complicated series of exchange controls...The program of austerity to which President Frondizi has committed his Government is officially regarded as 'one of the most drastic ever imposed'. It will attack inflation not only through the budget but through the taxation of luxuries and through surcharges designed to hold down or keep out imports that fall in the category of non-essentials."

This scholarly statesman and strategist on an often forgotten front of the cold war, has already done much to create a new symbol of stability in this Southern anchorage of the Western Hemisphere, as the first civilian President since the passing of Peron triggered the flight of other dictators in Latin America.

Vice President Nixon's trip to the inauguration of President Frondizi first focused attention in the United States on the importance of his regime's fight against the three mortal enemies of democracy -- Communism, Fascism, and Inflation. Said The New York Herald Tribune last November:

"What is important in Argentina..is the establishment of durable democratic government..Frondizi has set himself to this task, and his skill in leadership should serve him well."

Frondizi was quick to pinpoint the galloping cancer of inflation, and to prescribe drastic surgery; as Business Week reported as early as November:

"Inflation is mounting, with a 4 per cent average rise in the cost of living each month...In Washington's view, Frondizi has finally decided to push through a tough economic policy, despite Peronista opposition."

Equally courageous in the tradition of democratic leadership, Frondizi moved firmly and fairly to bring private capital from the free world into the development of the vast natural resources of Argentina. Said The New York Times:

"President Frondizi has calmly repudiated his nationalistic past and is taking two important and valuable steps, first in permitting foreign capital to help develop Argentine oil, and second, in settling the vital electric power conflicts with foreign companies..."

In that same month, the conservative New York Herald Tribune hailed his coming visit to the United States, against the background of this new and healthy development in Argentine-American relations:

"American industry and finance will do well to help Frondizi in his developmental plans, as part of the desireable goal of helping the free world...his forthcoming visit in January will provide an opportunity to further such cooperation..."

The New York Times has well described this new statesman of the New World:

"President Frondizi is an astute, able and intelligent leader."

And on the first weekend of the new year, The Herald Tribune summed up the significance of Frondizi's fight on this southernmost front of a global struggle:

"The Argentine government has taken a wise though painful step in plunging into a period of austerity. The economic situation of the country demanded that somehow the ruinous drain on gold and dollar reserves which began in Peron's time be stopped if Argentina was to be able to trade with the rest of the world at all. Now, President Frondizi has decided to look the future squarely in the eye. Argentines must tighten their belts, but at least they may do so with durable hopes.

Of the greatest help will be the $329 million economic aid program for Buenos Aires announced in Washington on Monday. It is the biggest single sum ever extended to a Latin American country, and includes loans and credits from the United States government, the International Monetary Fund and private United States banks. There will be money to keep the devalued Argentine peso from going under while the country is finding its new footing. There will be money to meet the immediate shortage of foreign exchange. There will be money for specific industrial and long-range development projects, including Argentina's large reserves of petroleum.

This last is particularly important. Indeed, oil is the great hope of the Argentine economy. Oil imports have accounted for the lion's share of Argentina's foreign deficit. Yet there is plenty of oil for the country's needs under its own soil, and the Argentines now expect that oil self-sufficiency can be attained in three years. Already, contracts calling for over $100 million of investments have been made with American companies. Oil is certainly the quickest and easiest answer to Argentine difficulties.

The broader implication of the new aid program is that a soundly based and directed economy is of great importance to the growth of democratic and constitutional processes in Argentina. Moreover, the determination of the Argentines to make serious sacrifices for the sake of future economic health greatly increases the value of the help they will receive. The new year begins on a note of hope for them."

There is attached to these editorial quotes an official schedule of President Frondizi's visit to the United States during the last two weeks of this month, touching Washington, Williamsburg, Charleston, Chicago, Detroit, New York, with the dedication of the new International Airport at Miami, linking the Americas, as his last dateline here.

We know that your own ~~news columns~~ newscasts will continue the task of shrinking the distance between the Argentine and the United States, a job already so well begun on editorial pages of the great papers of America.

We stand ready of course to answer any queries about President Frondizi's visit, as part of our informational assignment from the Argentine Government.

Very sincerely,

Tex

Dear Mr. Murrow:

This is normally the time of year we send you our invitation to our annual off-the-record foreign policy informational dinner at the Hotel Washington. It now seems unlikely that we will be able to swing that affair this year, for first time. The Council raises no funds except from its members and the two trade union officers who, in past, paid the check, the Upholsterers and Hat Workers, are hard hit by the recession and we hesitate to ask them again.

Yet, except for that grand one-man holding action by Secretary of State Dulles, which paid off so magnificently at Copenhagen, it has been a bad year for the Free World and our America, its destined leader, vs. Russia and slave world, as foreseen by de Toqueville one hundred thirty years ago. The Gallup Poll records the common sense judgment of most Americans, that we were losers in psychological war to slave power this year.

The unimaginative rigidity of the State Department, except for its top Secretary and one or two assistants and the juvenile arbitrariness of the fabled C.I.A., which seems itself infiltrated by sympathizers with the drive for recognition of the Chinese Red regime, made abortive an attempt by reputable voluntary forces from U. S., Asia and Latin America to put together a non-governmental Anti-Communist Federation in Mexico City in March. Both State and C.I.A. bear a direct responsibility for successful and unforseen communist campaign to smash the Nixon mission to Latin America. Remember our documentary warning of six years ago on Latin America by Dr. Alexander at our dinner of April 22, 1952?

Perhaps you can spare the time you might have spent, as in past years at our dinner, to read the two, long, enclosed documents.

Item #60 is a long letter to Editor Norman Cousins of The Saturday Review, analyzing how that reputable magazine was used this May to launch a new, fantastic falsehood campaign for our reconciliation with our enemies of Chinese Red regime.

Item #59 is a brilliant projection by Frank Barnett of present trends to our disastrous undoing a decade and a half ahead. It ranks second, in our opinion, only to George Orwell's "1984".

We would like to send you something shorter and more optimistic, but at a time when fools, like the so-called Committee for a Sane Nuclear Policy and knaves like the brilliant Linus Pauling, come close to influence sufficient to paralize, if not dismantle, our balance of atomic power which alone holds the old Hitler-style communist aggression by ultimatum and fait accompli of pre-1950, we, in all conscience, cannot tell you anything pleasing anymore than Demosthenes could the Athenians in the fourth century B. C.

MANAGEMENT'S ROLE IN NON-MILITARY DEFENSE

(Participate or Perish - a Grim Forecast of Consequences of American Business and Management "Letting 'George' Do It" - A.G.M., Editor)

Remarks by Frank Rockwell Barnett, Director of Research
The R-- Foundation, Inc.
at the National Military Industrial Conference
Chicago, February of 1958

STRATEGY IS EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

Fellow students of "strategy" --

In an age of massive propaganda and gun platforms in outer space, civilians are as close to the front line as soldiers. In an era when the classroom, the research laboratory, our economic system and basic beliefs are all involved in cold war conflict, "strategy" is everybody's business. Teachers and students, lawyers and bankers, engineers and managers, as well as labor leaders, all have a vital role in either the military or non-military defense of America and the rest of the free world.

WAR GAMES AND THE DEFINITION OF "STRATEGY"

Other speakers have talked about war games as good intellectual discipline for those who wish to help solve the multi-dimensional problems of "strategy" in the nuclear age. The Commandant of the Army War College urged us to think also of "peace games" in which America would learn to play poker for survival with resources other than our military hardware: our ideological and social armament; the strength and flexibility of our free economy; our religious, cultural and philosophical heritage; our scientific and technical skills; new psychological techniques; and sheer will power.

Learning to play these "games" of war and peace (vastly more complex than Monopoly, chess or bridge), we discover that strategy is no longer confined to the battlefield or the maps in the planning room of a general staff. Strategy, in our century of total war, now means:

> the mobilization, integration and prudent management of the political, economic, educational, technological, industrial, scientific, cultural, ideological and spiritual resources of the entire nation in order to secure the objectives of peace, justice and liberty-with-opportunity.

It is obvious that, in a free society, much of this task can only be achieved through voluntary action, individual initiative and new forms of creative partnership between limited government and private sectors.

A GAME OF IMAGINATION: H.G. WELLS' TIME-MACHINE

War games (like politics, chess and poker) can sharpen the intellect and give insight into human nature in conflict situations. Now I would like to ask you to try an experiment with another kind of game. Will you join me, for the next twenty minutes, in a game of Imagination? Will you pretend the 20th century has discovered time-travel as well as space travel? Let us suppose American science and industry have developed a pilot model of the famous Time-Machine invented by H. G. Wells.

Assume for a moment the Time-Machine is wired to this room - and that its range is 15 years into the future. Now, if you will indulge the fantasy, I am going to push a button, here on the speaker's stand, that will precipitate all of us forward into 1973. There! It is another February morning; the place is still Chicago; and the setting is the 19th annual Military-Industrial Conference. Only it is not called that. It is called the "Emergency Conference on Terms for an Honorable Peace."

HOW FARES AMERICA IN 1973?

1973 is a black hour for the American Republic. There is widespread unemployment. Business is stultified by a critical shortage of raw materials. American foreign trade has been strangled in a web of Sino-Soviet intrigue and economic warfare. The ever-expanding Communist Bloc has engineered iron-clad, trade monopolies in the handful of Latin American and African countries not yet completely absorbed in the vast, Marxian Commonwealth of nations, which now embraces 4/5 of the land surface of the earth, and stokes its further ambitions with the oil of the Middle East and the riches of what once was Indonesia. To the Russian and Chinese masses, Communism has added the manpower of India and much of Africa. We can neither buy from, nor sell to, more than 2 billion people.

The men who participate in this Emergency Peace Conference of 1973 have in their eyes the look of the accident victim who numbly intones: "--but this can't happen to me." And yet it has happened - and it continues to happen, as the chessmasters of Russia methodically coordinate and advance their deceptive inevitable checkmate. The story is told simply: in the decade from 1945 to 1955, a complacent America lost her matchless supremacy in science and military strength. In the 15 years that separate 1973 from 1958, American power has declined almost as rapidly as British power evaporated in the 81 years that stretched from Disraeli who bought Suez to Eden who lost it.

Kipling's "Recessional" applies to this America of 1973 --

> Far called our navy melts away,
> On dune and headland sinks the fire....

It is true the American Navy, with the scorpion sting of its underseas flotilla, still gives pause to the men in Moscow, so far as all-out war is concerned. But on distant dunes and headlands, where once the deterrent force of SAC pointed toward Moscow, there stand today gleaming Russian missiles aimed at Pittsburgh, Dallas and Detroit. With blackmail and persuasion, the Soviets have negotiated the withdrawal of American military power from the Communist rimlands. The argument was always the same: the pulling back of American forces would "reduce tensions" and widen the neutral "buffer belt" between Washington and Moscow. Then, with a brief "peace charade" or Summit Conference as a screen for clandestine operations, the Communists induced the nation dissolving its American alliances to gratefully accept the gift of Russian missiles and spontaneously welcome Russian technicians.

COMMUNISM HAS LIQUIDATED AMERICAN OVERSEAS INVESTMENTS

In the intermediate stage - between the political expulsion of American military bases on the same sites - the Communists also liquidated American investments overseas. The job was done with precision and subtlety. While one industry was being nationalized and another taxed out of existence, the Communists contrived to keep British, American and German businessmen divided on every specific issue, by stimulating "great expectations" for more trade.

Thus, while the Communists seized the tin and rubber, they stepped up their import of toys and their export of perfumes. Soviet puppets confiscated oil fields on the one hand but, with the other, encouraged the belief that the Afro-Eurasian heartland could eventually absorb a limitless outpouring of consumer goods from Western factories. Somehow, actual business never developed; but the promises, the earnest trade missions and the jovial reiteration of good will all worked their hypnotic effect.

MASSIVE PROPAGANDA HAS DISORIENTED THE WEST

By 1970, Russia had applied massive propaganda so skillfully to all media that the West was completely out of touch with reality. The democracies responded to false hopes for peace and dire threats of war with the same patheticability of dumb creatures in a Pavlovian laboratory. As illusion turned to despair, only to be followed by another Soviet induced illusion, the peoples of the West were wrung dry of their moral stamina, their self-respect and their courage to risk. Their leaders, sensitive to chaotic public opinion, were paralyzed into inaction, or, more frequently, into escapist activity that - while vigorous - was really irrelevant to the issue of survival.

AMERICAN "SACRIFICE" WAS TOO LITTLE AND ONE CONTINENT TOO LATE

It is true that, as the great structure of free world alliances began - nation by nation - to crumble, under the pressure of Soviet blandishments and nuclear blackmail, the American people learned to live with the word "sacrifice." But the sacrifice was always too little, too haphazard, and at least one continent too late. While the West was fashioning NATO to defend Europe, the communists consolidated their power in China and pushed their tentacles down the Islands of the Indies. By the time Asia was put on the American agenda, the Soviets had leapfrogged into the Middle East. Then, while America was pre-occupied with the spreading stain in Syria and Egypt, Communist cadres swarmed into the precincts of India and every corner of Africa. By the time Washington thought seriously about Africa South of the Sahara, Communist trade missions and agents had saturated Latin America.

One step behind, perpetually off balance and her timing controlled by an opponent's skill, America spent untold energy like a flailing giant in the boxing ring - a good natured, amateur giant at a country fair, mercilessly cut to ribbons by the cynical old pro who takes on all comers for $50.00 and the sheer fun of bloodying the farm boys. (If only the giant had taken an hour a day from his chores to study judo, his head might be clear enough to let him search coldly for his adversary's weakness instead of desperately - and ineffectually - defending himself. But farm boys have never heard of judo; and, until it's too late, they don't suspect the old pro has soaked his gloves in plaster of Paris.)

Yes, there was "sacrifice" as the Communist Bloc formed new coalitions in the United Nations that hamstrung America on every issue of international trade and military security. There was more "sacrifice" when, after the wonder of Sputnik had worn thin, the Soviets put gun platforms into outer space - to hover over New York, Chicago and San Francisco as a constant reminder that civilians in those vulnerable cities were only 30 seconds from the thermonuclear front. But the "sacrifice" was never of sufficient magnitude; it was never adequately sustained; and, above all, it was geared to misleading assumptions. For, in spite of the evidence, the American people could never quite bring themselves to believe the Communists meant what they said.

AMERICANS DIDN'T DO THEIR "HOMEWORK"

Intellectually, Americans gave lip service to the proposition that the issue was "nothing short of survival." But their behavior belied their words. It was really a problem in sociology. The American people had been too lucky, too isolated from tragedy by their oceans, too prosperous to understand the rules of the struggle for life in the back alleys and ghettos of Central Asia. It seemed virtually impossible for men reared in order, luxury and decency to conceive of deceit, chaos and their own annihilation. Emotionally they rejected the idea, even though their minds could comprehend the statistics that detailed Soviet nuclear firepower and the Communist billions spent on propaganda, subversion, espionage, guerilla warfare and the other components of total "conflict management."

Somehow, as a philosopher once said, stubborn facts were no match for a stubborn theory - or, for that matter, for stubborn, sentimental hope. Somehow, the American people who (in the 1930's) had not read Hitler's "Mein Kampf," or believed in the Nazi strategy of terror, still managed (in the 1960's) to ignore the strategy of Lenin, Stalin and Khrushchev. Refusing to admit the existence of organized evil, they neglected to take seriously the menace of Communist fifth columns and the infiltration of their own institutions.

THE SOVIET ULTIMATUM OF MAY, 1972

Now - in 1973 - after last year's debacle, it is probably too late. Ever since 1962, on the wings of trans-oceanic television, Communist leaders have regularly invaded American livingrooms to warn our people we could suffer 100 million casualties in any future war. The fear this threat has engendered - together with widespread confusion sown by covert Communist sympathizers - has immobilized U. S. military power at every crucial showdown.

The money had been spent, the weapons were ready but the will had been sapped. Last year - in May of 1972 - when it seemed certain that U. S. naval units and paratroop divisions would be rushed to the defense of the last free outpost in Asia, the Soviet Defense Minister wrote bluntly to all Western capitals. His message was brief and brutal:

"My associates, the Marshals of the Combined Soviet Air and Outer Space Forces, have asked me to remind the people of the capitalist bloc that mistakes can occur easily in time of trouble and tension. If American infantry divisions intervene in the internal affairs of a sovereign Asian Republic, who can say if such small firecrackers may not set off a dynamite explosion? Capitalist warmongers should not delude themselves that peace-loving peoples will fight in ways to suit the convenience of the colonial powers. Mothers and wives in America should think twice before they let Wall Street and the Pentagon start what is being fraudulently advertised as a limited war. The scientists and soldiers of China and Russia may take it upon themselves to define the limits of a limited war - and we can promise you the dish we serve may not stimulate your appetite for more!"

That message, reinforced by pitiless pressure from Communist peace fronts in all the democracies, brought on the resignation of the British Prime Minister, the indirect dismissal of the American Secretary of State, and at least two suicides in the Foreign Ministries of Europe. World public opinion, carefully manipulated by Soviet "hidden persuaders," hailed another victory for peace; and the last of the free nations in Asia was blotted out, while Americans watched even more helplessly from the sidelines than when, 17 years before, they had witnessed the murder of Hungary. With Chinese Communist tanks rummaging through the streets of his capital city, the gallant old Prime Minister of that last tiny, Asian Republic burned all records which might incriminate his anti-Communist colleagues and fled by helicopter to a submarine which spirited him to at least temporary safety in America.

THE PEACE CONFERENCE OF 1973

Gentlemen, this Asian exile leader is here with us, this morning of February 19, 1973. He has a message which I will read in a moment. In this setting, his message is controversial.

Although America is a semi-garrison state, we are proud that some controversy and free speech are still permitted. It is true that not too many citizens care to call Communism by its right name - for the Communist juggernaut is moving so swiftly that men, even in the United States, are now reluctant to be too outspoken lest their criticisms be remembered to their disadvantage by triumphant Commissars.

This Emergency Conference on Terms for an Honorable Peace, as you know, has convened in Chicago to consider a policy of unilateral disarmament as a means of convincing Soviet leadership our intentions are honorable. Scholars have argued from this rostrum that Communism - having over-extended itself - is now satiated and will reform itself from within. Business leaders have suggested that we can help our own economy and civilize the Communists by sending them a steel mill or two, and agricultural surpluses. Several speakers have held that our "outmoded" beliefs in private property are the real obstacle to peace - that if only we would evolve into a "social democracy," our system could merge peacefully with what men are now calling "moderate Communism."

The general feeling seems to be that we have no choice except to bow to Soviet power and the pressure of world opinion. This distinguished, exiled Asian Prime Minister, however, whose own country lies freshly under the heel of the tyrant, has asked Conference officials for the chance to be heard. His request has been granted. Owing to precarious health and emotional stress, he does not trust himself to speak and has asked me to read you his thoughts.

TO AMERICA - FROM THE LAST OF HER ALLIES

"Citizens of America, as of the last months of 1972, my country is enslaved. We are the 53rd nation to be submerged by Communist power. My son was lost in the last hours of the fighting in the streets and many friends, I fear, will be executed in secret cellars. It would be dishonest to say I am not bitter. But I do not come to abuse your hospitality with recriminations. I am not here to charge you have betrayed my people. But I must tell you you have betrayed yourselves.

"In Asia, life is hard and we learn not to expect too much from the frail vessels of humanity. But your America was truly blessed by paradise; you were perhaps the only men on earth who could afford ideals - and since you had much, much was expected: not so much in material gifts, with which you were generous beyond belief, but in sympathy and - above all - courage.

"Did you forget the shot, fired at Concord Bridge, really was 'heard round the world?' In your country, men seem to think it strange I have read Jefferson and quote from Lincoln. Why is that odd? Have you forgotten your American Revolution was, for all time and all peoples, the best hope for human happiness?

"As a boy, through the kindness of American friends, I studied at one of your great universities. In the long years I fought for my own country's independence, I carried with me on jungle and mountain roads, the biographies of General Washington and Benjamin Franklin. Perhaps to you, all that is distant past. But to the young nations of the earth, the story of your founding fathers was up to date. We too were founding fathers - not so competent as yours perhaps - and certainly not so fortunate. For when you won freedom, you were safe in your wilderness for 100 years and Russia was 10,000 miles and 6 months by boat away.

"Because my life is over, and even for you the hour is near midnight, I wish to speak bluntly. I have no more to lose; but humanity for 1,000 years will lose all if you Americans turn down the lamps to Moscow. It may be history will never again tolerate such an experiment with liberty as yours. I have seen America as a poor foreign student; and I know that in your land quite ordinary persons could do extraordinary things. Even plain people had a good life, and yet you did not sacrifice political freedoms to get economic opportunity. You worked both together.

"Your businessmen disliked the word 'welfare,' and yet they helped to build a private welfare state. We in Asia thought of all capitalists as men who exploited alien races for the advantage of a minority in the imperial motherland. The Communists said this was true; so did socialist intellectuals whose work we read. And you said nothing articulate to set the record straight!

"How could you expect others to believe in your revolution when you lost faith in it yourselves? Why did you send to your ideological battle-lines too many people who neither understood America nor the enemy they faced?

"In your great Declaration of Independence, it is written for all men to see that government which do not rule with the consent of the governed are illegal and should be abolished. Why did you act as if that universal truth applied only to Anglo-Saxons? Were not the peoples of Russia and Eastern Europe entitled to life, liberty and happiness? Did not the Chinese people and the North Koreans and the Vietnamese also desire a Bill of Rights? Were Communist wholesale murders of brown and black and yellow men to be ignored because only the white man longs for trial by jury? Could you turn your backs on slave labor and do business with Moscow and Peiping because you thought we poor people of the earth could not dream of liberty or nurse a passion for justice?

"What guilt you must have felt to be so apologetic for your way of life! You had both friends and foes in Asia. Why did you reward both, without discrimination? Why were you so eager to pacify demagogues who railed against you for minor flaws in your society? Why did you think you needed to 'adjust' American Foreign Policy to the whims and uninformed bias of world opinion?

"It is a noble thing to use power humbly and for generous ends. It is a tragic thing to be so afraid of power you cannot be responsible to yourself or others. I wish Americans had not been too busy to read history and philosophy. You would have learned more citadels are overwhelmed by internal doubt than by enemy scaling ladders.

"Once, when I was in a great American city, I listened to talk about affairs of state. Everyone said the U. S. should help small countries who were still free; but, also, everyone added America should take extra care not to push her own ideas for fear we Asians would resent this intrusion. Finally, I made a little joke; I asked this question: 'On the other hand, you Americans start every day by saying you cannot and must not try to make the world in your own image. This is because you do not wish to impose your culture on unwilling peoples. Yet, at the close of that same day you write letters to your Congressmen to maintain the immigration laws - for you well know a billion people, if they had the chance, would like to have the American image and the American dream.' There was no answer to my question then - so I ask it now of you: Why did you have so small a vision of your destiny?

"In the 1960's, when you still had the time and resources, why were you not at least as true to your Revolution as the Communists are to theirs? You would not have had to build an empire. That is not your way. All empires in the past carried wealth and power one way - from the edges toward the center. Your commonwealth - your wonderfully flexible, federal structure - your new form of welfare capitalism - might have spread justice, equality and decency to the ends of the earth. With you, new nations could have been free partners - not satellites. With you, they could have kept their religion, their art, their customs, their language. They could have kept their profits too, because you would have made profits both for them and you.

"You sent your medicine; you sent your food; you sent your good will; you sent your military missions and your diplomats; you sent your foreign aid and missiles. Why did you not also send 'missionaries' of freedom who could describe the American political-economy, the idea of liberty, the human energy that can be unloosed when men do things for themselves? And why did you not teach those things at least to your own children?"

Gentlemen, this is the end of the message; and our Asian friend has asked me to thank you for your courtesy. Unhappily for us, since this is 1973, his remarks can only serve as a friendly obituary. But we have one recourse: the Time-Machine. By pushing this lever into reverse, we can return to an hour in history when we still had the chance to plan our own destiny. There! Again, it is 1958. The Time-Machine, you will note, functions so accurately we are still engaged in the last morning's session of the 1958 Military-Industrial Conference on "The Role of Commerce and Industry in U. S. National Strategy."

THE TIME-MACHINE RETURNS US TO 1958

There will be many in this audience who feel this nightmare of the future is inconceivable. Doubtless they are right; certainly we hope so. But from pessimists a dread question must out: Can a democracy meet the total thrust of tyranny when there is no declared, dramatic emergency to impel free men to sustained and sophisticated action?

The question we ask about 1973 is perhaps similar to the trembling question Mr. Scrooge, in Dickens' "A Christmas Carol," puts to the ghost of Christmas-yet-to-come. Shown his final resting place in a pauper's grave, Scrooge asks the Spirit of the Future if what he has seen are things that will be, or only things that may be. The Spirit does not answer, but Scrooge - with an effort of will and a change in perspective - does, in fact, alter the pattern.

ANOTHER TRIP IN TIME - TO 1963

One purpose of this 1958 Conference is to alter the pattern - and refute Khrushchev's boast that, inevitably, our grandchildren will live in a World Soviet State. May I touch the Time-Machine once more - lightly and with the brake pedals set? Our second journey is only five years hence; the place Chicago, with the 9th Military-Industrial Conference moving toward a confident close. In 1963 the nation still faces peril; the warlords of Moscow have not lost the race; some areas of the free world are in danger. But the momentum of the Kremlin's thrust is gone. The band wagon psychology of militant Communism no longer seduces the weak and misinformed. Soviet success in science has stimulated an equal and more positive reaction in the West. "Peace" is still a far-off dream; but catastrophe has also been averted. And there is more freedom to maneuver.

What America did for free world defense in the five years from 1958 to 1963 requires 10,000 pages to detail. Distinguished speakers at this 1963 forum have already described the new standards in education, our tough-minded diplomacy, the promise of basic research, the professional management and evaluation of foreign aid (which now pays measurable dividends in security), the formidable capacity of our military to wage war - if need be - in new dimensions, on all continents and seas, and with recipes of force that range from the thermonuclear shield to the world of Guerrilla and psycho-social warfare. You have heard - on closed circuit, "live" television - a progress report from our manned satellite in outer space.

My job this morning is simply to read a summary of last night's Panel on Management's Contribution to the Non-Military Defense of the Nation. As you know, the purpose of the Panel was to inventory major accomplishments by business in this field and report what seemed to us to be the most significant innovations. Obviously, this brief summary does not begin to do justice to what American commerce and industry are doing to upgrade education, scientific research, public affairs, and overseas social and economic programs designed to create a healthy climate for freedom. With these apologies, let me read the Panel's report:

A 1963 SURVEY OF INDUSTRY'S ROLE IN STRATEGY

"In the five years from 1958 to 1963, American commerce and industry have shouldered a whole new dimension of responsibility. Their job of creating and communicating ideas has now evolved from institutional advertising toward moral and political philosophy. As one business leader puts it: 'This corporation will contribute its best brains to planning the nation's survival just as we have, in the past, encouraged our executives to work for local community welfare. Our stockholders agree that American corporations are entitled to buy cultural life insurance - a policy that protects the legal, economic and philosophical intangibles which form the invisible cement of our civilization. The premium on cultural life insurance cannot be paid in money; it can only be paid with the vitality and imagination of the ablest men we have.'

"The Panel's research staff reports that 230 large corporations, banks, law firms and publishing houses have appointed Vice-Presidents of Public Affairs. These men are assigned full time to creating programs in foreign policy, economic philosophy and defense strategy. They serve as trustees of corporate foundations. They are more knowledgeable members of local school boards and universities. Some teach graduate courses in economic theory. Many of them are well-known writers and lecturers. Almost all of them have served, on leave of absence, in the Department of Commerce, State or Defense. Others have introduced new managerial techniques into our foreign aid program.

"Possibly because corporate giving is now supervised by these Vice Presidents of Public Affairs, business has shifted more of its largesse from local welfare to national security - including the security of overseas areas linked to our prosperity and defense. For example, business foundations, in recent years, have set up a dozen management institutes abroad to train foreign personnel in modern business methods which, until recently, were imperfectly understood outside this country.

"From those overseas business schools are graduating the vanguard of a new middle class in the underdeveloped nations, men with talent, social responsibility, and a stake in the future.

"Our Panel must also report that the word 'strategy' has become almost commonplace in the board rooms of industry - since, way back in 1958, Major General Max Johnson of the Army War College delivered a definitive lecture on strategy for a free society to the Military-Industrial Conference. The privately endowed foundation he recommended, the Institute for American Strategy, has been established; and Americans in all walks of life are doing their 'homework' on history and the facts of international politics. Clausewitz and Lenin are not yet best sellers, but they are required reading not only in political science courses but even in some advanced management schools.

"Indeed, in 1963, the Harvard Business School now gives a whole semester's course on 'strategy' to executives working for our great international corporations. Last year, (1962), the American Management Association held four regional seminars called "Business and The Geopolitics of Tomorrow" - and there was standing room only. There are even three consulting firms which specialize in making presentations to corporate directors on the probable impact of science, strategy, sociology and world politics on business trends.

"Businessmen - together with military associations and educators - support strategy seminars in more than 50 universities and major American cities. Businessmen - as trustees of school boards and colleges - have helped raise the status and salaries of teachers. And young America is being taught both to know the American heritage and to know our enemy. Comparative Ideology is a required course in most good high schools.

"Vital aspects of national security have been systematically studied by various business and trade associations as part of their own internal education programs. For example, in 1961, a joint committee of the American Bankers Association and the Foreign Trade Council produced a blueprint for private economic development in Latin America that, as you know, has put the Communists out of court. The Advertising Council and The Public Relations Society of America continue to make dynamic contributions to our ideological offensive everywhere. In short, the power of the private sector has been voluntarily harnessed to 'defense.'

"In the Panel's view, however, the most significant event of the past five years has been the establishment of a Business Council of Foreign Policy Advisers. This group, somewhat similar to the long established Business Advisory Council, now gives American overseas industry opportunities to help formulate U. S. foreign policy, just as British industry - through the Board of Trade - has long worked in close partnership with the Foreign Office. British business and banking, for obvious reasons, looked outward from their island to the world. World affairs were, of necessity, matters of the greatest interest to the commercial and financial giants who built the British Empire. In our own country, foreign policy was almost irrelevant to American industry in the days when it was preoccupied with developing our own continent. But today, in 1963, with $56 billion worth of private investment overseas, American business is training men to accept new responsibilities in the foreign field.

"It is encouraging to report also that American businessmen, diplomats and military personnel have evolved a new and more harmonious teamwork in their joint efforts to advance the cause of security, freedom and abundance overseas. American businessmen and State Department personnel understand each other better and support each other's goals more effectively, now that it has become evident to almost everyone that American capital is not only efficient, but sensitive to ethical, cultural and social values. A mature free enterprise has proved that political democracy and true economic democracy - where every consumer and every investor has a vote - can be synonymous.

"The Panel wishes to conclude its report to this 1963 Conference by expressing its conviction that, in the years to come, American commerce and industry will not fail to recruit and train even larger segments of their leadership for at least part-time, voluntary service in some sector of non-military defense."

CONCLUSION

Gentlemen, we are back again in 1958, after two excursions into the future. One picture is bleak; the other hopeful. Men can adjust to history or make history adjust to them. The Soviets have chosen the latter course. We can do likewise. The task may seem enormous; but the stakes are even higher. And let us remember, if we are discouraged, that great events are always determined by minorities. Forty years ago Communism was confined to a rented room in Zurich, the brains of Lenin and the ambition - and raw courage - of a few other outcasts, most of whom were totally unknown to the "power elite" of Europe. Less than 100 men - if we count the Committees of Correspondence - made the American Revolution. For a time, the whole future of this nation was carried in the will and heart of a lonely man who walked the winter lines at Valley Forge persuading his ragged countrymen not to quit and go home. If we are depressed, remember that the odds against America in 1776 were at least 100 times greater than they are today.

There is more than enough talent in this one room to serve as the lever that begins to change the course of history. But time is notoriously impartial. In strategy - as in war, business and politics - time favors only those who know how to use it.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Frank Rockwell Barnett, former Wabash College Professor, is a World War II veteran who became a Russian interpreter for the 69th Infantry Division, the first American unit to meet the Red Army on the Elbe River in April, 1945. (Previously, he was a student of geopolitics and Russian conversation, history and culture at Syracuse University.

After serving as a Military Government official in Berlin, he won a Rhodes Scholarship from Indiana and read philosophy, politics and economics at Oxford University. While in England, he had opportunities to revisit Berlin during the Russian blockade and the airlift, to participate in a summer seminar on political science at the University of Zurich, and to interview exiles from the Communist Empire who crowded into London after the fall of Czechoslovakia and the purges in Poland, Hungary and other Iron Curtain nations.

He is a Director - and former Executive Secretary - of the American Friends of Russian Freedom (55 West 42nd Street, New York City), a private committee which gives food, clothing, language training and useful work to anti-Communist Russian escapees. His proposal to recruit a "Legion of Liberation," printed in the Congressional Record in 1951, helped induce lawmakers to appropriate $100,000,000 to form Iron Curtain refugees into military units for defense of the free world.

Subsequently, Mr. Barnett became associated with The Richardson Foundation, Inc., 122 East 42nd Street, New York City, as Director of Research. He is a member of Phi Beta Kappa, Phi Gamma Delta, the American Legion, the American Association of Rhodes Scholars, and the National Committee of the Council Against Communist Aggression. Recently he has lectured to the Army War College and to national conventions of the N.A.M. and the Reserve Officers Association on techniques of Soviet conflict management. Articles by him have appeared in the Russian Review, TheOfficer, The Military Engineer, and the Congressional Record.

Mr. Norman Cousins, Editor
The Saturday Review
25 West 45th Street
New York 36, N. Y.

Dear Norman Cousins:

I have held my pen and counted nearly up to ten days before writing my reaction to your elaborate featuring on cover, and in leading review by the ineffable Han Suyin, of Simone de Beauvoir's "The Long March" on Communist China.

I am shocked to find this book of highest praise for the Red Communist regime, with its rawest distortions of fact and history and sharp attacks on all anti-communist critics of Red China, which surely must have been written under Communist Party discipline, ecstatically featured and even more quiveringly reviewed in your May 17, 1958, issue.

I am not surprised because the book reviewing and publishing trade in the New York publishing capital (and even its Boston suburb) was first infiltrated by the communist cultural offensive until broken up by the much abused Congressional Investigating Committee's exposure of individuals, since fired by the less than vigilant New York Times Magazine and Book Review publisher, Little, Brown & Co., etc.

After that there still lingered on in key posts, like a narcotic habit, the hankering for the good old days of pseudo liberalism when a little Soviet totalitarianism now and then was relished by some of the most liberal feeling men. As late as 1950 there was the unrevealed scandal of the publishing world when Albert Herling's documentary summary of the Gideonese Voluntary Commission of Inquiry into Forced and Slave Labor, published under the title of "Soviet Slave Empire," was sabotaged by a

Executive and National Committee*

N. F. ALLMAN, FRANK BARNETT, ARNOLD BEICHMAN, ROY BREWER, REV. DENIS COMEY, S.J., BISHOP FRED CORSON, NICHOLAS DE ROCHEFORT, SYDNEY L. DEVIN, EDWARD R. EASTON, DR. WM. W. EDEL, GENERAL ROBERT L. EICHELBERGER, WILLIS ETTER, DR. BEN A. GARSIDE, ARTHUR J. GOLDSMITH*, ROBERT HECKERT, GEORGE HOLCOMB, DR. STANLEY HORNBECK, WALTER KIRSCHENBAUM, VICTOR LASKY, SOL M. party sympathizer who was switched at the strategic moment from the largest American bookseller's store in the nation's capital to manager in the given publishing house in time to prevent the sending out of even the usual notice to libraries, main purchaser of such volumes. On top of that came the conspiracy of silence on the part of the big three of reviewing, including the Saturday Review, on Edward Hunter's "Brain Washing in Red China," which first added this word to the language.

Long after, the Ad Hoc Commission of the U.N., set up by the International Labor Office, and the Economic and Social Commission had scooped the American publishing industry with U.N. published findings, verifying the suppressed and smothered book by Al Herling of years before. (Fortunately for their illusions, book reviewing magazines like the Saturday Review are not obligated to review official U.N. publications and this documented rebuke to self-deception and public deception of so many inexcusable years need not be noted.)

Retiring reluctantly from tenaciously held entrenched bias and breastworks of apologetics for Soviet slave society, the tattered forces of pseudo liberals and sincere liberal illusionists in publishing and reviewing fell back to the intellectual entrenchments of the "there is still hope in Red China" cultists, long prepared by that skilled and devoted group of scriveners, Agnes Smedley, Edgar Snow, Owen Lattimore, et al, assisted by such reserve skirmishers as Nat Pfeffer, Theodore White and, occasionally, Pearl Buck. It is the sieve-like memory and wishful thinking about preserving freedom without painful risks, including acknowledgment of past folly and superficiality which enable a Nat Pfeffer to write, in August 18, 1951, New York Times in an article supplementing such calculated current deception as your May 17, 1958, review, such words as "Now that the Chinese Communists are no longer opposed to use of terror as a political weapon," when his own 1934 articles describing such terror were to be found in his own articles in "Current History."

As said the wife of one liberal Chinese businessman, who in 1949 took seriously the advice of American friends who swallowed the then current version of nonsense of people like Han Suyin about (and I quote) "the outstanding tendency in Peking to tell the truth painstakingly and punctiliously," "the Chinese Revolution is getting more gentle and more reasonable," "it has tried not to kill unduly," etc., ad nauseam, and was framed and executed for his folly, "I hate the communists for their cruelty and I hate the Americans for their superficiality." Both hates are soundly based.

The Saturday Review and its contemporaries on China, and you in your fear-frozen fixation on the menace of the H-bomb to exclusion of any basic concern for freedom and soul and dignity of free men, remind me of my fellow American Socialists in 1940 in the first stage of the war against Hitler. At their convention in mid-May of that year, in Washington, they decided that the danger to America and freedom of any involvement in France and Britain's fight was much greater than Hitler and were sitting around congratulating themselves on their foresight and courage, and planning a great isolationist-pacifist campaign on evening their convention adjourned, when in came someone with newspapers telling of ending of the sitzkreig with the Hitler invasion of Denmark and Norway. Up spoke one intellectually vapid but sincere pacifist and said "probably just British propaganda to justify their own aggression on Norway's coast." Up spoke, plaintively, a Philadelphia lawyer, shaken out of his illusions of the afternoon debate, "Do we have to be on the Fascist side always?"

I say to you on the basis of your featuring of Han Suyin's review, do you have to be on the communist side always? In China, apparently, yes, and now that Bertrand Russell, out of a concern for world peace and survival (which I share) and a senility and hatred of America (which, fortunately, I don't share), has struck the basic position of most of you - "better surrender to communist slavery and lose our souls as free men than endanger our genes"and risk the dangers of vigorous, courageous action which has won periods of peace in past history of struggles against dictators.

How rigid with fear and grasping at intellectual straws and how beyond reach of your rational processes is your position can be seen from my own experience with this fantastic action of yours in featuring this repulsive review of May 17!

On April 6 I received warning of World Publishing Company's having been swindled into putting out this two-year-old, and already refuted by history, communist propaganda tract on Red China. The man who wrote that warning might be an instructive example of intelligence and courage for you and your colleagues in this period of your stereotyped hysteria campaign to paralyze your fellow countrymen's will to resist communist aggression. I say stereotyped because I heard you at the National Education Association in Philadelphia last fall, and then months and vast events later at All Souls Church in Washington and not all that time and those events had changed one phrase in your address or showed you one new thought or fresh formulation of the old.

The writer to me on May 6, who had secured an advance copy of The Long March from a bookseller friend and read it with amazement and clear foresight as to who would be suckered by the clever snow job on the blood soaked Chinese totalitarian regime, is a young and prospering attorney in a university town. In 1950, as a reserve officer and parachutist, he and colleagues there, of same age, were asked by Pentagon if they would volunteer for extra dangerous duty as parachutists behind enemy lines in Korea. He and everyone of his group wired their acceptance. The telegram was mislaid and they heard no further until at an area briefing conference, long after they learned that everyone else in their unit elsewhere had volunteered, had been called, and were total casualties, not one surviving. In obligation to their slain comrades they determined as civilians to take on a dedication to a group who would inform themselves in sacrificial thoroughness on nature, inspiration and operation of the forces of communist aggression. Each member to qualify must read, master and report on at least eighteen basic volumes on history of communist movement, its doctrines, tactics and performance. Small wonder that local booksellers furnish them with advance copies in the field.

Having read the analysis furnished from my young friend, when my wife, a few days later, said the current issue of The Saturday Review had a review of a book on China, I was able to tell her title, author and thesis of the book, and from my knowledge of built-in bias of your Saturday Review editors I was able, sight unseen, to accurately relate exactly what your chosen type of reviewer would say about it. Still, prepared, as I was, against surprise, the shock of reading Han Suyin's review was very real since she has gone far beyond even the author and out-Heroded Herod.

The book is billed by publishers as a "report on agrarian reform" by a top writer "long versed in Chinese history and culture." Here is the hoary old communist propaganda lie description of Chinese Communists, invented in 1930's as a phrase by an American communist leader, with deliberate intent to deceive and disarm the gullible American public and, most gullible of all, its book publishing and reviewing interests, on nature and aim of Chinese Communist forces.

It was hard to believe that I was reading in a free world independent magazine when I found reviewer Han Suyin covering up the fact that the author, this "top writer, long versed in Chinese history and culture," could speak no Chinese and recorded everything from conversations with Chinese Communist leaders or through interpreters furnished by Chinese Communist officials. The Han Suyin defense is an offense in more ways than one. She simply adopts the Hitler-Stalin basic device, "the big lie." She dares write for the supposedly literate and informed people who supposedly read and edit the Saturday Review that "There is, in fact, an outstanding tendency in Peking to try to tell the truth painstakingly and punctiliously."

This is the sentence on a regime that promised the peasant an end of landlordism, cruelly deceived him into participation in mass murder of scores of thousands of "landlords," and then made the state the supreme, single and most oppressive landlord in China's history. This is the description of a regime that called the movement of a couple of million men and arms into Korea the action of "volunteers;" this is the regime whose members from top to bottom ground out the great lie of "germ warfare" by U.N. forces in Korea; this "painstakingly and punctiliously" truth telling government is the one whose head bade a hundred views to bloom and when they were tempted out in the open and cut off 99, and if they were lucky they only got sent to a labor camp for their folly in believing Mao, Chou En Lai and such camp followers as Simone de Beauvoir and your reviewer Han Suyin. It is not too much to say that these gentle women who write this description and you, who uncritically print and publish it, are in a very real sense accessories before and after the fact to the communist murders of individuals, of truth and of the future hope of both peace and freedom.

The recounting of the happy intellectuals' rejoicing that they will not be killed this time, only "thrown out of the party, told to reform their ideas, lose their jobs and be sent to a 'farm' to clean up their ideas by manual labor," sickens me to read. After finding such tripe in your Saturday Review, a supposedly free world publication, I shall feel slightly ill every time I see that I am still giving it house room. Of course your reviewer who brings up the hoary old bromide, repeated every four or five years for the last forty years of bloodshed about Soviet regime. Says she, "The Chinese revolution is getting more gentle and more reasonable. Whatever Americans may think, it has tried not to kill unduly," and adds the bigger lie that "for in the good old days of the Nationalist Government they would have been shot out of hand. If that lie of your reviewer were even in minor degree true, most of her friends of whom she boasts, educated and trained in free universities of Nationalist China even in period of twenty-two years of communist maintained armed civil war and invasion, would not be around to run the communist totalitarian regime and tell her lies which she repeats in your magazine.

Remember what this is glossing over. The maximum of estimated casualties in the four years of Nationalist vs. Communist civil war, which brought communists to power, is estimated at a million or less; yet this regime which gullible fools like Han Suyin, and presumably The Saturday Review editors and their ilk, say they believe has consent of Chinese people, murdered 800,000 of its civilians in a few short months, long after it was in power, in a period of only a part of 1950, according to its own estimate; two million to three, according to Nehru; and three times that number, in 1949-53 period, according to A.F.L. and State Department sources. This takes no account of the hundreds of thousands slain in the Korean and Chinese-Soviet aggression against South Korea, Indo-China, etc.

Your reviewer, in conclusion, hopes her author will return to China and write another such book on the "long march out of hopelessness and misery towards . . . a more human world." It never even occurs to her that perhaps it is just a long day's journey into night for meagre, if any material, gains. I see that Communist regime ruling mainland boasts that agricultural production now, in 1957, exceeds for first time the production of the last relatively peace time year of the Nationalist regime, before invaded by Japanese Empire and again harrassed by Chinese Communist armies from Yennan and their ideological allies in American writing and publishing industry.

Altogether, sir, I am amazed at your own and your colleagues' temerity in daring to criticize the general press in its performance of its function of accurately informing the public. I have in my lifetime yet to see in any daily newspaper account, however biased and prejudiced, as calculated a piece of featured misinformation and deception as you have published in Han Suyin's review of her fellow propagandist Simone de Beauvoir's book.

In the past I have written to challenge you on facts that were less than facts in your written eoniums on Nehru, and you have privately admitted error but never redressed factual balance publicly or in print. When Eric Goldman of Princeton, an historian, who wrote a text for high school students on outbreak of war in 1939 without mentioning even the name of the Soviet-Nazi Pact, writes a lead article in The Saturday Review, in which he says that all those opposed to Red China recognition are uneducated boors from west of Alleghenies, you assure me that he is writing utter nonsense which you believe (or hope) is self-defeating, but nothing ever appears to this effect in The Saturday Review, and now you throw this totally nonsensical review that defies the law of factual gravity in almost every sentence into featured position.

In late 1940's, Dean Roscoe Pound of Harvard, in China at request of Chinese Nationalist government to redraft their judicial code along western lines, a reform that no other east Asian country has ever suggested to this day, saw repeated articles and book reviews in the two respective magazines of "The New York Times," which consistently ran counter to facts that he was observing firsthand. He sent accounts of the outrage to a literary friend in New York, who submitted them to the responsible editor. The responsible editor explicitly responded that "the man (in error) writes in an interesting fashion and that is all the Times requires." Dr. Pound tells me that as of that time he simply adopted the rule of not writing to The New York Times or its editors.

When the Senate Internal Security Committee, comparatively recently, uncovered a little nest of past communists and present fifth amendment takers in key positions on book review sections of both New York newspapers of repute, I wrote Arthur Hays Sulzberger, pointing out to him how these boys of his had worked him and the book reading public. A friend of mine, who has spent twenty-five years in China, much of it in the interior, who speaks the language, whose family has done missionary work for three generations, in 1952 wrote a favorable little story on the Chinese Nationalists in Formosa, a rare book and viewpoint indeed on publishers' list. It was reviewed, honestly and critically by Robert Aura Smith of The New York Times' own staff, just back from Asia. One of the so-called minor employees of the N. Y. Times magazine, exposed by Senate Committee as past, if not present, member of N. Y. publishing industry communist cell, and who was among several which Times, with ill grace, had to fire, was in charge of "scheduling." When R. A. Smith saw publisher's release date go by a week or so, he inquired. The "responsible editor" said it must wait its turn. Finally, many months later, after such a book was safely off booksellers' shelves, the review was published in an obscure page. The work of the communists on the staff was quietly well done then, as it had been done consistently for years in past. When I saw you rush Mrs. Beauvoir's book into front page featured review even before publisher's release date, I marveled how the old racket of suppressing or losing reviews of pro-Nationalist or anti-Communist books on China and rushing out uncritical ones of praise for this enemy regime still goes on its way rejoicing.

I might note that Arthur Hays Sulzberger himself wrote me an indignant letter, saying my letter was "a tribute neither to his vigilance or his intelligence," as forsooth it was never intended to be, and demanded right to communicate with Dean Roscoe Pound on his letter which I had mentioned. I quickly granted permission, which was scarcely needed, whereupon Sulzberger turned guest over to that same "responsible editor," Lester Markel, the original delinquent who wrote me in plaintive grievance when Dean Pound indignantly remained silent at being approached by the original offender.

While attending the Annual May Meeting of the Unitarian Association this forthcoming week, I have a date to seek out the old lion at the Harvard Law School and persuade him to relent, but after The Saturday Review performance of mid-May perhaps it is impudence on my part to plead and perhaps after this long effort I should quit writing to you on same principle.

I have one justification for you left. If your conscience stirs you to publish a contrary review of the de Beauvoir book by someone who knows and cares what he is writing about, I can judge you, however foolish and unvigilant, to still retain your integrity. In 1946, when Ed Weeks published an account of the Warsaw uprising by the perpetual professional Soviet propagandist, Anna Louise Strong, without any identification of her partisanship and then rejected an answering article by the respected Raymond Leslie Buel, I wrote him a biting resume of my firsthand account of Miss Strong's long service of duplicity for the Soviet and concluded in final sentence that "Sir, you are not an honest editor." God forbit I should have to write that line on and to the present editor of The Saturday Review.

Sincerely yours,

Dear Ed:

I certainly enjoyed meeting with you today and welcomed the opportunity to hear your views on the many subjects we discussed. In addition, I am grateful to you for the opportunity to discuss our Baltimore Conference with you.

As I indicated, I am enclosing with this letter a copy of last year's program and a brochure that details some of the comments and statements relating to the men who gave the challenge last year.

I have been giving some thought to this in relationship to you and I am still convinced there are many things you could say to these programming people that they would enjoy hearing but, more importantly, would be a source of activation and inspiration for them. I think we must constantly realize that you are not just a newsman but rather represent someone who, in every way, sums up the ideal of a responsible newscaster ... that is, a man with a heart, a feeling for humanity, and a point of view.

Perhaps the word "challenge" is a stumbling-block and a little misleading. Perhaps it would be better to label this a "call to action." As you can appreciate, much of it should be down to the basic level of your ideas on technique and concepts of production which, I am sure, will be immensely rewarding to the thinking of local Program Directors -- even though you speak of network shows. For instance, take the item we were discussing at lunch, the superb job you did on Truman last Sunday. There is a great lesson to be learned for these artisans of our profession, whether he has $100 to build a show or $100,000, whether he is working for a 250 watt station or the great CBS Network. I suppose we could summarize this by calling it the wonderful virtue of simplicity, of letting the big story carry itself and not over-gimmicking it.

Beyond this, your use of the term "the little picture", tending to convey the warmth and wonderful impact of real people and of genuine human interest in the course of producing a program is, I am confident, something which carries a great deal of importance to every professional in this business.

The whole area of news, of course, is literally as big as all outdoors with abundant opportunity to stimulate these people to a higher level of result and to capture the immediacy, the visual quality, and the many other factors that are presently underdeveloped.

Lastly, I think the American programmer would like to hear from Ed Murrow the man. These people speak your language and you will find them a good, responsive audience that would like to hear you tell how you feel about the role and function of the broadcaster -- whether he be local or national -- and whether this vital business of ours can be related to American security, education or culture. Do you think that the drive for scientific and research education will overlook and minimize the general cultural education? Do you have any pet ideas or or pet projects? Finally, what would you like to do if yours was the responsibility of programming a radio or television station?

As you can see from the above, I have no hesitancy at all about the appropriateness of your talk, nor the ability on your part to do a most effective job. I hope I haven't oversold it.

I hope the above information will be of sufficient value to have you favorably consider this question and we are most grateful to you for this consideration.

Kindest personal regards.

Cordially,

Don

THE BOSTON CONFERENCE

In welcoming you to The Boston Conference on Public Service Programming, I'd like to thank and commend you for your willingness to join us in this meeting.

You are giving us—and, we hope, yourself—a rare opportunity to explore the present and future potentials of this area of the broadcasters' responsibility.

This is your Conference. It is a working Conference. We have no intention—nor have the panel members who have generously consented to join us—of preaching to you about public service programming. Rather, we solicit your active participation at every session.

Let us hear from you! Working together during these three days, discussing our common problems and goals and dreams, we can realistically hope to come closer to proving that broadcasting is most effective on stations that have earned the respect and confidence of the communities they serve.

Donald H. McGannon

President
Westinghouse Broadcasting Company, Inc.

TO MEET A CHALLENGE...

WBC

A Report on Public Service Programming by Westinghouse Broadcasting Company

The Challenge

GREAT THINGS DON'T REALLY HAPPEN until somebody gets excited about them. This is especially true of Public Service.

What do we mean by "public service programs"? We mean programs—other than pure entertainment shows—that seek to enlighten, educate, yes, even inspire our audiences—yet programs that contain the indispensable ingredients of showmanship, excitement and mass appeal.

It's one thing to say, "Yes, we must do something about better schools, or public interest in history and literature, or the calibre of our news reporting." It's another matter to do something—in our case through broadcasting—so exciting, so compelling that the results will reach deep into the hearts and minds of the people we serve, and move them to act.

In this kind of public service programming lies the challenge.

What kinds of programs will stimulate new ideas and attitudes in our audiences about teen-age problems? What can we do about mental health to make our communities, our nation, our world a better place to live in? How can we use the giants of communication—radio and television—to educate, to stimulate people to think?

Certainly, showmanship is important . . . and creative skill and energy . . . and a constant eye and ear for quality. It is our job to use tools like these in every public service project we tackle.

In this, we are not being wholly altruistic. Showmanship in public service programming helps create greater community appeal, personality and impact for our stations. Mass audiences are vital to our business. And so, showmanship that packs them in for public service programming is good business, just as it is in commercial broadcasting.

Ideas are important. With ten stations producing shows in seven great markets, we draw heavily on cumulative thinking and viewpoints. From the combined means, abilities and purposes of station and group management come the germs of ideas that grow into effective public service programs.

Money is not the key to great public service programming. Many broadcasters, ourselves included, know that it is primarily the willingness, the keen desire to do the job, that creates great public service broadcasting.

Above all, in meeting the challenge, we are motivated by the fact that all of us are responsible broadcasters. As such, we work constantly to go far beyond those elusive percentages of programming in the public interest that will satisfy the FCC. We work for quality and results as well as quantity. After all, a dull program that fails to attract audience does not do an effective job, no matter how much "credit" it earns.

We haven't found many of the answers to the challenge of exciting public service programming—which in itself is part of the challenge. But in seeking those answers, we often check ourselves against a WBC credo, which says, "Broadcasting is most effective on stations that have earned the respect and confidence of the communities they serve."

This is but another way to state the challenge. In this report, you'll find some of the ways we've tried to meet it. We hope they will be of interest to you. Your reactions will help make our efforts even more productive in the future.

THE BERGEN EVANS SERIES . . .

"OF MANY THINGS"

To the challenge of stimulating listeners' intellectual interests, Dr. Bergen Evans brings wit and erudition, creating a provocative series that revitalizes the classical essay, and transforms it into a delightful radio format.

Bergen Evans talks "of many things" on WBC

. . . and shows how exciting radio can be today!

It's just one man talking into a microphone about any subject that strikes his fancy. But the man Bergen Evans has such wit and wisdom that "Of Many Things" is a newsworthy kind of program.

John Crosby in his syndicated column said, ". . . It's too bad it's not on more stations." Variety said, ". . . It's eminently satisfying programming. Radio could use a lot more of it."

WBC thinks that literate programs can be lively, and that education and showmanship mix very well. That's why the WBC radio stations produce "Of Many Things," in association with Louis G. Cowan, Inc. It is also why WBC recently produced a series of documentaries on the major problems of education and another series on childhood problems, "Growing Pains," featuring Helen Parkhurst.

They are all prompted by a basic WBC belief: That broadcast advertising is more effective on stations that have earned the respect and confidence of the communities they serve. For more facts call Eldon Campbell, WBC National Sales Manager, MUrray Hill 7-0808, New York, or your nearest WBC station. See why . . .

Anne W. Langman

IF YOU were watching television on a Sunday afternoon in January, you might have seen Sean O'Casey, in his apartment in Torquay, England, talking with a young American friend. "What is life, Bob, what is life? Well, I have found life an enjoyable, enchanting, active and sometimes a terrifying experience, and I've enjoyed it completely. A lament in one ear, maybe, but always a song in the other. And to me life is simply an invitation to live."

He said a great deal more in that conversation, his distilled wisdom in lines of sharp beauty. The program was one of a series, Conversations With Wise Men. It has been on the air in one form or another since 1952 and has presented such distinguished elders as Pablo Casals, Bertrand Russell, Edwar[illegible] Arnold Toynbee.

Good Talk

Bergen Evans, a veritable repository of odd information, has started a new series of programs for the Westinghouse Broadcasting Co. which are called "spoken essays," a fairly apt description. This is the sort of thing that people have tried to get on the air ever since the days of Alexander Woollcott and Will Rogers. No one has done very well at it so Evans is flying in the face of tradition. But it's a good try.

The Evans' essays will wander all over the place. Some of the topics: the nature of humor, Machiavelli and his significance ("Actually," says Evans, "he was at heart a democrat."), Mark Twain and his times, phrase origins, the function of a critic ("That I must hear!), Sinclair Lewis ("Now that Main St. has television. . . . Now that George [illegible] P. Babbitt has grown old and [illegible] and his son Theodore [illegible] Babbitt has [illegible] mates of [illegible]

HELEN PARKHURST'S

"GROWING PAINS"

Teenagers are supposed to be a problem. Certainly they have problems. With the help of world-famed educator and broadcaster Helen Parkhurst, WBC has tried to meet a challenge: to give voice to teenagers . . . to reflect their attitudes . . . to help them find themselves in relation to their own problems, their parents, their futures. Parents can be a challenge, too. "Growing Pains" was produced as much for them as for their wondering children.

"If we're going to have any kind of living together, we must have some sort of an understanding..."

This is a boy from Boston, talking to a lady named Helen Parkhurst about racial prejudice.

The same Helen Parkhurst asked youngsters in Portland, Ore., about military service. One said, "It isn't actually fear that bothers you . . . it's you don't know when you're going or where."

Sometimes teenagers are more direct than the great masters . . . like the one who said about art, "I put the feeling inside me in my hands."

Young people's feelings about themselves . . . their problems . . . their futures in the wonderful world around them . . . that's the heart of "Growing Pains," a new documentary radio series produced by Westinghouse Broadcasting Company.

Helen Parkhurst, famous child psychologist, is the spark who lights the youngsters' imaginations, the magnet who draws out their deepest feelings. The result: a new understanding for parents . . . for everyone . . . of the powerful stirrings in our young people.

This new series by WBC, with Helen Parkhurst, is only one in a growing list of outstanding WBC public service programs—programs like "Of Many Things," "The Big R," "How Shall We Learn?" This kind of programming is emphasized by WBC because we believe that broadcasting is most effective on stations which have earned the respect and confidence of the communities they serve.

"Growing Pains" is produced exclusively for the WBC stations, but is already being broadcast on a number of educational radio stations. We shall be happy to make it available to others. Call Richard Pack, WBC Vice President in charge of Programming, at MUrray Hill 7-0808, New York.

Helen Parkhurst, educator, radio and television personality, has gone adventuring in the child's world and found it "interesting and rewarding."

She is here in Pittsburgh ... to prepare a series of programs for KDKA, based on interviews with Pittsburgh children.

The series will be called "Growing Pains" and is scheduled to begin the middle of November.

As the name implies, the series will center here and around the lives, problems and joys of boys and girls from 10 to 15 years of age.

Miss Parkhurst, a noted child psychologist, will use her knowledge and experience to help adults and children understand each other better.

Through this understanding, she believes, everybody will benefit, but the chief emphasis will be on helping children to reduce juvenile delinquency.

WBC Teen-Age Show Praised By Parents And Educators

Patrons of teenagers are joining with educators all over the nation in praising the new Westinghouse Broadcasting Company public-service program, "Growing Pains." Offered by all five Westinghouse radio stations, the series is giving young people a chance to air their views on such subjects as military service, clubs, and home conflicts.

The program was produced by Helen Parkhurst, well-known educator and child psychologist, with the assistance of W. J. Kaland, WBC's assistant program director. Parkhurst gathered and assembled some 10,000 feet of tape recordings made by teenagers from Massachusetts to Oregon. These frank discussions by American teenagers are being broadcast in a series of 30 half-hour shows.

Through her own dynamic personality and by her promise that no names would be used, Miss Parkhurst was able to capture the candid opinions of many teenagers. Purpose of "Growing Pains" is not to prove anything shocking but to present the teenager's outlook on life and the problems that confront him.

This is just one of a number of radio and TV programs WBC is offering in the field of education. It can be heard on KDKA Pittsburgh at 9:30 pm Thursdays; on WBZA Boston-Springfield, 7:30 pm Mondays; on KYW Cleveland, 7:30 pm Sundays; on WOWO Fort Wayne, 7:30 pm Sundays; and KEX Portland, 7:30 pm Sundays.

Teenage 'Growing Pains' Featured on WBC Stations

A SERIES of 40 half-hour tape-recorded programs, in which teenagers discuss various problems of concern to teenagers, is being launched by Westinghouse Broadcasting Co. Radio stations this week. Program, called Growing Pains, the series features Helen Parkhurst, educator, author and child psychologist, in discussions with groups of high school students in all cities where WBC has stations.

In the discussion, the teenagers give their views on subjects as diverse as early marriage, problems of parents, sex, dress, life and rock-and-roll music. The series has been in preparation for six months. William Kaland, WBC assistant program manager, who is producer of the program, said the idea was to present the teenagers' outlook on life and the problems that confront them.

EDUCATORS, public officers, listeners by the dozens, reacted to Helen Parkhurst's radio documents on teenage problems.

May I express my interest in your Thursday evening program "Growing Pains". I heard it last week when the topic under discussion was art, children artists, and the parents' attitudes to such children—also some of the problems the young people meet in pursuing their work.

The program was excellent and I want to extend the hope you will continue your efforts in this direction. For striking out into the darkness surrounding mental illness, the National Association for Mental Health made this award, citing WBC's "outstanding service in the fight against mental illness . . ."

"Sing-Along for Mental Health"

Mental Health problems have always been with us, but seldom discussed on the air. In studying the nation's No. 1 health problem, WBC saw a challenge: to shatter the wall of silence and arouse the public conscience about the need for attention to mental health.

The taboos attached to serious mental cases were one thing. The fact that mental illness in early stages exists so widely all around us was another. To make the subject palatable was a touchy business.

Music sells products of all kinds to millions of Americans every day, via radio. Can you use the technique of the familiar musical spot announcement—with its proven audience appeal and impact—to "sell" the cause of mental health?

WBC feels it found a way with its unique "Sing-Along for Mental Health" songs, which combine the forms of American popular and folk music with eloquent and authoritative lyrics. The songs were written by the top team of Zaret and Singer, recorded by nationally popular artists like Eddy Arnold, Betty Johnson, Bill Hayes and The Toppers.

The tunes pack extra punch on the WBC stations because they do a job not just now and then, but many times a day, 365 days a year, inserted in and between high-rated music and news programs. They're localized, too, hitched to live copy that tells the listener about his community's mental health needs and resources. And now the "Sing-Along for Mental Health" songs are being adapted to television, with spritely animation adding dimension and impact.

This is public service with a beat—and it works!

Medical leaders had something to say, too . . .

"My congratulations for a very imaginative approach to public education for mental health. The combination of catchy tunes and clever and thought-provoking lyrics should be very helpful in introducing the concept of mental health to large numbers of people in a simple, wholesome, memorable way."

WILLIAM C. MENNINGER, M.D.
The Menninger Foundation
Topeka, Kansas

" 'The Sing-Along for Mental Health' songs are a job well done. I never would have thought it was possible to put such worthwhile words as 'need for research' and 'more trained personnel' into songs and have them sound so pleasant and persuasive. I hope everyone in America has a chance to hear these songs, for their own sake and for the great cause of mental health."

"Westinghouse Broadcasting Company has been outstanding in its support of the Conference program and in the time and thought it has given to the White House Conference and the whole educational problem."

These were the questions posed to national delegates at history's greatest education forum . . . the White House Conference on Education.

WBC's challenge was clear: to meet our obligations to our communities by reporting, interpreting, clarifying, dramatizing the meaning of the Conference, and by driving its significance home so the people would understand and act.

WBC began by arousing interest in the Conference at the grassroots level, telling the people what it was all about.

WBC sound and camera crews ranged across the country to produce documentaries that probed the depths of school problems: "The Big R" for television, with Raymond Massey . . . "How Shall We Learn?" for radio, with Dave Garroway.

Came the Conference, and full-time teams of WBC photographers and reporters were there to get the news for the people back home. Stations collaborated to cover the story on film, tape and telephone, highlighting news of special local significance to the WBC cities and towns.

We did this because we believed that few other news events of 1955 held more meaning for the future of America.

"The Big R," with Raymond Massey, was one WBC floodlight on the problems of a hard-pressed educational system. To produce this four-part documentary, WBC crews and Producer Ben Hudelson visited 50 schools, shot 13,000 feet of film.

NATIONAL EDUCATION ASSOCIATION CONVENTION

When teachers get together, it's not just an ordinary convention. What they think, plan, decide, has meaning for parents and students, for our communities, for the nation.

That's why WBC decided the 1956 annual NEA Convention was important news—so important that we assigned a full crew, headed by WBC Educational Director Gordon Hawkins, to work the convention around the clock.

Recording and reporting common problems and common goals discussed by some 15,000 teachers, the WBC team produced special broadcasts and daily wrap-ups for the WBC stations from Portland, Oregon, to Boston, with constant vigilance for local angles affecting the WBC communities.

A Salute to those who are "Proud to Teach"

WBC wrapped up the White House Conference results in a TV film report, "The Challenge," and followed up with "Section 16," a documentary on the history of teaching. At NEA Convention time, WBC President Donald H. McGannon presented prints of both to Miss Martha Shull, President of the NEA.

At the Convention, the NEA honored WBC—along with the Associated Press, Columbia Broadcasting System and Look Magazine—with one of the first "School Bell Awards."

National Education Association of the United States

"We are gratified that you have seen fit to present these films to the National Education Association for distribution to school and community groups and to television stations throughout the country. It seems to us particularly appropriate that the gift was made as the Association enters its Centennial year.

"The Westinghouse Broadcasting Company has made a real contribution to the cause of education by producing the films, "Section Sixteen" and "The Challenge." Not only are they skillfully planned and produced, but more important, they serve to extend and perpetuate the effectiveness of the White House Conference on Education."

A News Story

"SPOTLIGHT ON SCHOOLS"

Education is news. But it's not limited to headlines like the White House Conference or the NEA Convention.

Education makes news every day, 365 days a year. And so, another challenge for WBC: to cover educational events in depth every week, and to catch the human interest side of the news that will excite WBC listeners to reaction and action.

To get to the heart of the news, WBC lined up Henry Toy, Jr., President of the National Citizens Council for Better Schools, as reporter-editor of the weekly "Spotlight on Schools." His appealing and authoritative air-columns sharpen the meaning of educational news for parents, children and educators alike.

John K. M. McCaffery's "BOOKS AND VOICES"

How do you review books on the air? How do you make the printed page exciting and meaningful in the medium of sound?

WBC gave the assignment of doing a new kind of book program to John K. M. McCaffery, editor, newscaster and critic.

"Sarah Bernhardt got $1,000 a day . . . and she got it in gold"

That's the late Fred Allen talking on "Books and Voices." The conversation continues. "You had to pay her every night . . . when the sun went down. She was always afraid that she would die during the night and you might owe her something."

Here's Grace Metalious defending her "Peyton Place." "I don't think it's terribly fair of anyone to say I was making an effort to be deliberately shocking. I was not. I did the best job I knew how with the characters I had to work with."

It's not always authors who spank. Another evening a college girl describes the heroine of a recent novel. "She seems to be the tiredest young lover I've ever read of!"

Books come alive on WBC's new radio program "Books and Voices," a sort of literary salon of the air. John K. M. McCaffery of "Author Meets the Critics" and TV newscasting fame is the moderator. By adroitly mixing specially taped interviews, author's reading of their own works, and music with his book reviews, he adds the dimension of sound to modern literature. George Bernard Shaw . . . Dylan Thomas . . . Wilson, Taft and Teddy Roosevelt—the people who make books worth reading make wonderful listening on WBC.

"Books and Voices" follows the WBC tradition of great public-service programs designed to entertain while informing. Its enthusiastic reception wherever aired confirms our belief that broadcasting is most effective in stations that have earned the respect and confidence of the communities they serve.

Educational films are great tools of the modern classroom. Now, WBC has adopted these schoolhouse instruments, and given them new dimension and audience through television.

Broadcasters are excited about the entertainment resources now available to them through the release to TV of the great Hollywood feature films. WBC is just as excited to be able to show viewers of all ages the greatest group of educational films ever assembled —the Encyclopaedia Britannica Film Library.

WBC's for exclusive broadcast use in its markets, this is a fabulous treasure of 650 documentaries on health, geography, history, science, children, animals, sports, and art.

Sometimes programmed as short features, sometimes integrated into ambitious local productions, the Encyclopaedia Britannica films are instructing, amusing and interesting WBC audiences in such far-flung subjects as The Story of Rice, and Ocean Voyages . . . Alcoholism, and Atom Smashers . . . Home Canning, and Galileo's Laws . . . Nursing, and Snapping Turtles . . . Children of China, and Yosemite National Park . . . Carnegie and Jackson and Washington Irving . . . Posture, and Productivity . . . Shooting in Basketball, and Learning to Study, and Beginning to Date.

Public service programming on the WBC TV stations is getting an exciting lift from the Encyclopaedia Britannica films. And selections from WBC's library are being made available to educational TV stations in the WBC markets: KQED, San Francisco; WOSU-TV, Ohio State University; WQED, Pittsburgh; and WGBH-TV, Boston.

Provocative public service program material is where you find it. The challenges are always there. To meet them, we must be ready to grasp the tools that are all around us.

Spreading the word...

WBC has followed the "good neighbor policy" in making our group-produced educational programs available. We believe in sharing them with our colleagues in the field of non-commercial broadcasting.

In doing this, it's our hope that WBC's group programs will reach greater audiences, and will contribute to programming on educational stations whose staffs and circumstances are often limited.

Into the WBC-produced educational programs go the ideas and creative thinking of ten stations, which are constantly producing public service programming in seven major markets. WBC group headquarters acts as a clearing house for the ingenuity and abilities of our station staffs. Through their local perspectives, we are able to see opportunities for projects of national scope, and to use our group resources to meet common challenges.

Not to share the results of such group efforts would be doing a disservice to our industry, and, more important, to the audiences our industry serves.

This "good neighbor policy" has resulted in series like "Growing Pains," "Of Many Things" and "Books and Voices" being carried regularly on New York City's WNYC . . . Ohio State University's WOSU . . . Purdue's WBAA . . . University of Pennsylvania's WXPN . . . Duquesne University's WDUQ . . . WPWT-FM, Philadelphia; and WBC educational TV shows on WGBH-TV, Boston . . . WQED, Pittsburgh . . . WOSU-TV, Ohio State University . . . and KQED, San Francisco.

It's gratifying to know that these outlets give WBC added opportunities to reach and stimulate people. And it's also gratifying to get reactions like that of Seymour Siegel, Director of the Municipal Station of New York—who says the WBC group programs carried on WNYC "represent the most forward-looking public service programming on the part of any commercial radio station in the United States," and hopes "that WNYC may be permitted to continue to present these Westinghouse programs. . . ."

You, Mr. Siegel, and others like you, will indeed!

Dear Dick:

With the end of the year upon us, I cannot help dropping you a note to tell you how appreciative all of us at WNYC are for the privilege of broadcasting so many magnificent program series produced by the Westinghouse Broadcasting Company in the course of the year.

It has been a distinct privilege for WNYC to be able to air such outstanding productions as "Growing Pains", "Of Many Things", and more recently, "Books and Voices". Westinghouse can certainly take a bow for putting into practice the old adage that good programming is good business. From where I sit, I would consider that these productions involving Helen Parkhurst, Bergen Evans and John K.M. McCaffery represent the most forward-looking public service programming on the part of any commercial radio station in the United States.

I hope that WNYC may be permitted to continue to present these Westinghouse programs to New Yorkers, and I send you our collective best wishes for the Season and for all of 1957.

Cordially yours,

Seymour N. Siegel
Director

"Growing Pains" is produced exclusively for the WBC stations, but is already being broadcast on a number of educational radio stations. We shall be happy to make it available to others. Call Richard Pack, WBC Vice President in charge of Programming, at MUrray Hill 7-0808, New York.

The Challenge of NEWS!

News is one of the great services of any radio or TV station. But there's a lot more to doing a real news job than just transmitting the news.

In radio, for example, WBC newsmen are not rip-and-readers, who tear copy off the tickers and put it on the air. WBC stations have their own news departments, reporters and editors covering and writing the news, with tape recorders and mobile units to capture the actual voices and sounds of the news as it breaks. They do a local and regional news job that's in the greatest tradition of radio journalism.

In TV, too, WBC stations have their own writers, editors, producers and cameramen, and even, as in radio "stringers" in the outlying areas.

Adding to this all-out local coverage are news documentaries like KPIX's "Decision or Dilemma" . . . and newsy discussion shows like WBZ-TV's "Meet the Editors" . . . KDKA's "Allegheny Roundtable" . . . KYW's "Cleveland Press Club" . . . KEX's "Argument in Oregon"—that give lively voice to community problems.

That's not all. Because WBC—as the largest independent group broadcaster—can put the resources and facilities of its entire organization behind its stations, WBC stations receive their own special coverage of major national news stories. For example, WBC newsmen were on the scene recently at the National Conventions, National Election headquarters, and the Presidential Inauguration. Now, with WBC's own full-time correspondent established in Washington, WBC stations will get even wider coverage of national events, with emphasis on the local slant.

WBC newsmen have eyes and ears on the global scene, too. WBC crews recently reported the Suez Canal and Hungarian crises direct from the UN, and it's not unusual to find a WBC station like KYW-TV sending a reporter-photographer crew abroad to interview Hungarian refugees arriving in Vienna.

News is one of the greatest public services. WBC's assignment: to get the news, get it completely and fast, get it out to the people!

WBC RADIO and TV stations are told to stand by as . . . ROD MacLEISH, WBZ+WBZA News Director and WBC anchor man for UN coverage, takes up vigil at Security Council, gathers the news for all WBC stations.

Sometimes a group like WBC has a chance to help make news on a national scale.

WBC PRESIDENT
Donald H. McGannon presents first pressing of "Register and Vote" songs to John Cornelius, American Heritage Foundation President.

Long before Election Day, WBC acted to meet another challenge: to get out the vote! What would move the people to use their franchise? If commercial jingle techniques worked to promote mental health, they'd work again . . . and they did! Signing top writers and talent, WBC produced a series of "Register and Vote" songs that got saturation scheduling on the WBC radio stations.

But it wasn't enough. The challenge was a national challenge. So WBC turned the election songs over to the American Heritage Foundation, which supplied them to radio stations across the country.

Impressions? They couldn't be counted! But the vote was the largest in history, which was satisfaction enough.

Telling the Hometown Story

WBC stations are deeply rooted in the communities they serve.

We are part of Main Street . . . the churches and schools . . . the parks and ball fields . . . the business districts . . . the homes. Our people live and work and belong in these communities.

We're constantly looking for more and better ways to help, to promote, to serve our hometowns.

We use broadcasting, of course. But we also look for other media that will serve the ends of community public service.

Twice in the past two years, WBC has run series of advertisements in Look Magazine to promote the communities we live and work in.

In some cases, the advertisements have covered a broad market story; in others, some major community project that demands national attention and support.

In all cases, reprints of WBC's Look advertisements have been widely circulated to local, state and national leaders in government, industry, finance, education and other fields.

ONE OF THE UNUSUAL WBC APPROACHES to broader community public service has been the use of Look Magazine—first in 1954-55, and now in 1956-57—to tell stories of the WBC communities to more than 20,000,000 Look readers.

It Happens on

Whether it happens on Grant Street in Pittsburgh, Beacon Street in Boston, Calhoun Street in Fort Wayne, or California Street in San Francisco, all WBC public service is basically local, hometown service. It reflects the thousands of communities, large and small, that our ten stations serve.

Group productions like "Of Many Things" and "Books and Voices" are only a small part of the total public service effort of Westinghouse Broadcasting.

In hundreds of ways—with spot campaigns, program series, documentaries, spectaculars—each WBC station builds programming to meet the local public service challenge, and to interpret national causes to the housewife getting dinner ready, the salesman on his way to make a call, children and teachers at school, teenagers home from school, older people waiting to see their hopes fulfilled.

WBZ-WBZA's "NEW ENGLAND HERITAGE" . . . Weekly series paints exciting background of New England history, features visits of Carl deSuze to such landmarks as Concord (shown here), Lexington, Wright Tavern, Old State House.

KDKA-TV PROGRAMS GRAND OPERA . . . To help the world-renowned Pittsburgh Opera Society build interest and attendance for productions, KDKA-TV has twice cleared out prime evening time to carry entire operas from the Syria Mosque stage.

KPIX's "EVERY MAN'S RELIGION" . . . Planned to contribute wider understanding and appreciation for religious convictions of many faiths, series premiered last year with remote from aircraft carrier, U.S.S. Essex.

KYW-TV's "JUVENILE JUSTICE" . . . To teach traffic safety, KYW-TV launched weekly series, enacted by teenagers for teenagers, in cooperation with Cleveland Police Department. Typical court cases are tried, with youngsters from 28 high schools taking parts of judge, jury, witnesses and accused.

WOWO's "FINE ARTS PROJECT" . . . Long-range plan to publicize Civic Theatre, Philharmonic, Art School and Art Museum, and to raise money for a Fort Wayne Fine Arts Center to house them, finds WOWO carrying symphony rehearsals, complete operas, plays, spots recorded by national figures. Here, WOWO's Ray James and Tom Longsworth donate $2500.00 in time to start fund for Center.

Main Street...

WBC's "Lamp of Knowledge"

KYW-TV's "TV SUNDAY SCHOOL" . . . Mrs. Ethel Brewer instructs a typical "TV class" on KYW-TV series which airs Sundays at 8:30 AM. Show is an actual Sunday School on television, for children of all faiths.

Challenges frequently breed challenges. Excitement over local public service programming on the WBC radio and TV stations has led to establishment of annual WBC "Lamp of Knowledge" awards, with station program managers and their assistants competing for college scholarships and major cash prizes.

For 1957, the "Lamp of Knowledge" competition among WBC stations is based on imagination and success in community public service programming on American History . . . Mental Health . . . The Teacher . . . The need for Scientists and Engineers . . . and "Project X"—any local public service project planned and produced to make the community a better place to live in.

As the WBC stations challenge each other for the "Lamp of Knowledge" awards, they take another giant step toward meeting the challenge of vibrant local public service programming.

KEX's "ARGUMENT IN OREGON" . . . Twice-weekly discussions on this series make lively listening with protagonists like those shown here: U. S. House of Representatives candidates Phil Roth and Edith Green—making one of their few joint appearances in a hot campaign.

KDKA's "NAACP ROUND-UP" . . . Weekly report on NAACP activities and accomplishments, aired Fridays from 9:15-9:30 PM, is commentated by Marian Jordan, NAACP Pittsburgh Director, shown here interviewing Paul Jones of the Pittsburgh Courier and Jackie Robinson.

WIND's "SUNDAY EVENING CLUB" . . . Big feature of Chicago's religious week is huge non-sectarian meeting in Orchestra Hall, held since 1907 "to promote the moral and religious welfare of the city". WIND regularly carries major addresses by religious leaders who come from all parts of the country to speak to Sunday night audiences.

WBZ-TV's "BIG BROTHER" . . . Big Brother Bob Emery delights the kids with everything from historical tours to the care and feeding of teachers. This time, he was making film on Boston's new Animal Rescue League quarters.

Meeting the Hometown Challenge

KYW's "STETHOSCOPE"... Produced to discuss signs of ailments, treatments, possible complications, "Stethoscope", with Moderator Sanford Markey (standing), covers almost every major disease and health problem, with the help of doctors from the Cleveland Academy of Medicine.

KDKA-TV's "HOUSE CALL"... Monthly feature on medical science is produced with cooperation of Allegheny County Medical Society and University of Pittsburgh Medical Center, MC'ed by John Troan, right, "House Call" visits leading authorities like Dr. Jonas Salk, left, discoverer of famed polio vaccine.

WBZ-TV's "BOOM TOWN" ... Another kids' special, "Boom Town" stars Cowboy Rex Trailer, whose entertaining shows have a serious purpose. Boston Fire Department rallied recently to help Rex put on Fire Prevention Week demonstration on life-saving.

KPIX's "ADVENTURES IN PRINT"... Using rare mementos from museums and libraries, series explores colorful past of California and figures who made state's history. Subjects range from Jack London's waterfront to the building of SF's Bay Bridge.

Sometimes you have to buy a horse...

For want of a horse... a WBC reporter didn't fail. He got the story! His name: Rod MacLeish, News Director of WBZ+WBZA, Boston—recently named WBC Washington Correspondent. His assignment: covering the New England floods, back in '55.

When news of the disaster broke, MacLeish hopped into a jeep and roared out of Boston into the inundated areas of Connecticut and Rhode Island. He talked and taped, told the story until his jeep broke an axle in a flooded ditch.

MacLeish wasn't stopped. He chartered a plane that would fly him into an isolated area, so he could capture the awful truth of what the swirling waters were doing to the lives of the people. Landing in a soggy pasture, the plane hit a cow. MacLeish paid an irate farmer for the cow, bought a horse from him, and kept on going.

He got the story, vividly, completely. And as the waters drew back, thousands of WBZ+WBZA listeners opened their hearts and homes and pocketbooks to the people Rod MacLeish rode out to meet.

That's typical of the enterprise that gives WBC news coverage a lift, turns news reporting into public service.

Rod MacLeish didn't have a WBC exclusive on floods in 1955. Across the country, flood waters hit Northern California, from the Bay Area to Yuba City. KPIX flew news crews into the area, rushed films and stories back for telecasting, jettisoned regular programming until the story had been covered in depth ... and until the secure citizens of Northern California had been rallied to rescue and to aid.

Emergencies are always with us. A newspaper strike in Cleveland silenced one major source of information as sparks of war were being struck in the Middle East, and the National Election was upon us. The WBC stations acted without hesitation—covering major world stories at the source ... posting news bulletins at high-traffic spots ... feeding the news to government and industry ... announcing civic meetings. All in a day's—or in this case four and a half weeks'—work.

A New England eye bank was almost out of its precious stock. WBC told the story. A man dying in a Boston hospital heard the call, willed his eyes to the bank. A week later, a woman from Maine and another from Nova Scotia climbed back out of darkness into life.

Hungary was on fire. WBC saw the fearful reflection on the face of Cleveland, second only to Budapest in Hungarian population. Interviews, announcements, special documentaries took the place of commercial programs ... a reporter-photographer team was hired in Vienna to get the story of refugees pouring out of Hungary ... stringers at Camp Kilmer were lined up to meet the first bewildered Hungarians to reach America. The stage was set. Then, KYW radio and TV started a drive for bedding and clothing and furniture for Clevelanders' fellow Hungarians, and the donations still pour in.

A gentle snow fell on Indiana. Drift built on drift through the night. There would be no school tomorrow. Worried Board of Education heads turned to WOWO, Fort Wayne. Only one request was needed. Beginning in the early morning hours, WOWO carried the message. The message got through. Not one pupil in 188 Fort Wayne area schools tried to brave the treacherous drifts.

Stories like these happen in our communities every day, every week. Emergencies are always with us. Our challenge: regardless of cost or contracts, to do the thing that must be done ... fast, fearlessly, and with results.

Sometimes you can buy a wing...

The kids toe the stage shyly, beam up at the big-name entertainers . . . the 'phones start ringing . . . and you're well on your way to buying a new wing for the home of hundreds of Pittsburgh foundlings.

You work overtime to study, interpret, dramatize the urgent problem of mass transportation in San Francisco . . . shoot and edit thousands of feet of film, use prime time to program this dynamic new approach to an old problem . . . and watch the State Legislature go into action.

You kill the bulk of the 11:00 PM news to tell the heart-breaking story of the kidnapping of a nine-year old girl, to alert the community to be on the lookout for her or her abductors . . . and get the thrill an hour later of breaking the late film show to announce that the story got through, the kidnappers panicked, the girl is released and safe.

Whether it's a KDKA-TV telethon to raise $200,000.00 for Pittsburgh's Rosalia Foundling Home . . . KPIX's "Decision or Dilemma" documentary series that led the citizens to get a rapid transit bill introduced into the California State Legislature . . . or fast action that returns a terrified kidnap victim to her mother's arms . . . it's not the method that's important, but the results . . . the payoff . . . the happy ending to public service programming.

Effective public service programming on WBC stations continually writes happy endings. Seven hundred neediest families in Boston have happier Christmases because of a WBZ-Salvation Army drive . . . the Pennsylvania Association for the Blind's annual broom sale tops $39,000.00—six times greater than any previous year—when KDKA-TV takes over . . . 600 election workers sign up when WIND backs a Board of Election Commissioners' plea for help . . . Fort Wayne will have a Fine Arts center largely because of WOWO's dedication to a cause . . . KEX's interpretation of mental health problems has started legislation for expanded research and hospital facilities throughout Oregon.

The challenges are always there. And so, often, are the results . . . the payoff . . . the happy ending.

KPIX dramatized the need for an overhaul of San Francisco's mass transportation system on "Decision or Dilemma" series, that stimulated State Legislature action.

KDKA-TV telethon raised $200,000.00 needed to build a new wing on Variety Club-supported Rosalia Foundling Home, Pittsburgh.

Impressive figures, reflecting the way WBC stations—in the past two years alone—have met the challenge of helping local and national organizations meet a variety of human needs.

But figures don't tell the whole story. Behind those figures are the talented performers, producers, writers, engineers—whose combined efforts give these thousands of programs and announcements greater impact . . . integrating them into or around high-rated shows . . . producing them to gain the utmost appeal and persuasion out of the materials they have to work with.

And now...

FOR THREE DAYS at the end of February, over 200 men and women met in Boston to talk local public service programming, under the auspices of Westinghouse Broadcasting Co.

There were station managers and program managers and producers . . . educators . . . network executives . . . clergymen . . . newsmen . . . members of government . . . performers. They came from more than half the states in the union, and they outstayed a tightly-packed agenda with dedicated purpose.

They talked and listened, watched and learned from each other. They wondered and argued and gave form to thoughts and ideas that were stimulating, frank, controversial, questioning, often brilliant.

The Boston Conference hit the planning board at WBC many months ago, as a meeting for our own program people. As it took form, it was suddenly evident that we must invite representatives of other stations whose interests in this field parallel ours.

From modest beginnings, The Boston Conference became not just the pioneer local public service meeting, but broadcasting's first industry-wide programming meet . . . with effects that are echoing today in the farthest corners of the broadcasting world.

But the big point is not how many were there, or how it all started, or who sponsored The Boston Conference.

The outstanding fact is that the purposes and accomplishments of The Boston Conference will sharpen the excitement, step up the effectiveness of local public service programming—not just on the WBC stations—but on stations across the country.

Our only regret is that physical limitations restricted invitations to The Boston Conference to 110 stations. We hope that a distribution of reports on the panel discussions will make up for this in part—and we plan to take further steps to overcome such limitations next year, when WBC will again hold a Conference on Local Public Service Programming.

WBC is humbly grateful to those men and women—all substantial leaders in broadcasting and education—who came to Boston this year to join in a common dedication to the advancement of local radio and television public service programming . . . and particularly to the participants from this impressive list of stations . . .

They Talked and Listened...

"The awareness of the radio and television broadcasters of the obligation and responsibility they have to the public is nowhere demonstrated better than in the fact of this meeting . . .

"However, in the increasing complexities of our life both within our own country and its relations with the rest of the world, comes a greater challenge of how can you better do the job . . . how can you foster that understanding heart which sees no difference in the color of a man's skin or his religious faith . . . today and tomorrow. The fact that over 100 broadcasters are here in a 'hats off to the past, coats off to the future' attitude gives promise that you will find the answers . . .

"I think that if the resourcefulness and imagination of program people like yourselves—which has already made our system of radio and television the best in the world—is applied to this challenge, the results will be still another major contribution by broadcasting to this nation.

"I want to congratulate Westinghouse Broadcasting Company for organizing this conference on local radio and television public service programming, and all the stations which are taking so much time to exchange ideas and to explore mutually ways and means of increasing even further the appeal and impact of local broadcasting. It is a meaningful demonstration of how seriously American broadcasters take their responsibilities to the communities in the nation they serve, and I wish you well in your deliberations."

HONORABLE RICHARD M. NIXON
Vice-President
United States of America

"THE CHALLENGE"

"Never before in our history has it been so important that our people be well informed. The security of the United States and the world itself depends upon broader knowledge, deeper understanding, and a sense of moral responsibility on the part of all people."

MILTON S. EISENHOWER
President, Johns Hopkins University

"We have in our country the most elaborate radio and television networks in the world, and in your respective roles in that vast complex you control a tremendous power. I am sure that you will do all you can to insure that this power will be employed always in the public interest, toward man's advancement, in behalf of freedom, of justice, of world order and of secure peace."

DR. RALPH J. BUNCHE
Under Secretary, United Nations

"We are a young country, but a very vital country. Into an incredibly short space of time, we have crammed an exciting turmoil of people and ideas. But if Americans, and especially young Americans, do not grasp the nature of this turmoil, then they have failed in an important part of the business of being an American. And, I think, we have failed them also.

"I can think of no more useful function for radio and television than in helping to broaden our people's understanding of their very rich heritage in history. I hope that a greater understanding of this problem and its challenges can come from this conference."

HONORABLE JOHN F. KENNEDY
U. S. Senator, Massachusetts

"Until we recognize our duty to our children; until we recognize that we're cheating them when we do not spend absolutely as much as we should, we are not going to have an educated citizenry. If we wish to retain our supremacy and freedom and opportunity, it is incumbent upon your industry to carry this message to our people."

"Meet The Critics"

PANEL:
Anthony LaCamera, Boston American
Dwight Newton, San Francisco Examiner
Merrill Panitt, TV Guide
Fred Remington, The Pittsburgh Press

CHAIRMAN: Lynn Poole, Director of Public Relations, Johns Hopkins University

Among questions covered were "What is a critic's role in broadcasting?" . . . "What is the critic's responsibility to his readers?" . . . "What qualifications should a critic have?"

Mr. Remington felt a critic should be an experienced newspaperman who judges radio and TV from the average audience viewpoint, as he would judge a news story. Mr. Newton said the critic "should judge a program on the basis of its worth." Mr. LaCamera said a critic should show more leniency toward a local public service program than toward a slick network offering, but Mr. Remington felt the public likes or dislikes a show regardless of its origin.

While the critics agreed that good writing is a "must", Mr. LaCamera said that "writing is only a means to an end, the end being to inform viewers and listeners of what's going on . . . and what shows are good or bad." All agreed that they have the power to cause stations to regroup their program thinking, but that this power carries a responsibility to be honest and sincere in judgments.

"The critics have deserted us in radio," said Sherwood Gordon, WSAI, from the floor. "All we have left are listeners and advertisers." While other radio executives agreed, panel critics contested the point. Some felt that radio doesn't vary enough to make regular copy, although Mr. Remington said, "Most of us go out of our way to dig up radio news." Seymour Siegel, WYNC, stated, "If radio isn't getting enough coverage, it's the stations' own fault," and called for better public relations on the part of station executives.

Television—Assignment Public Service: "Freedom"

PANEL:
Bernard C. Barth, WNDU-TV, South Bend
Herbert B. Cahan, WBZ-TV, Boston
Carl Fox, KYTV, Springfield, Mo.
Lewis Freedman, WCBS-TV, New York
Ralph A. Renick, WTVJ, Miami

CHAIRMAN: Jerome R. Reeves
KDKA-TV, Pittsburgh

Mr. Reeves opened the panel with the thought that, "Imagination is the all-important tool of the program builder in harnessing educational force to personality impact. There's hardly a phase of national life that doesn't cry out for more and better exposure of its creative thinking."

Mr. Barth described WNDU-TV's current campaign on participation in citizenship, which injects freedom topics into regular and special programs, and uses spot announcements widely. At WCBS-TV, Mr. Freedman said, "We attempt to approach a subject from a fresh, new angle . . . educate the viewer when he least expects he's being educated." He advised, "Don't worry about ideas. Find vehicles for them. Be original. Work on essentials, that don't cost anything." He demonstrated his point with a kinescope of a Socratic Dialogue done in modern dress—"a network show done with nothing but empty space, light, $6 worth of string and two actors."

Mr. Renick covered freedom in the form of a series of news documentaries, and called for TV stations to "exert a positive influence in community life." He showed a WTVJ documentary on the problem of segregation on Florida beaches, and told how it helped one city solve the problem. Mr. Fox emphasized the importance of teaching freedom to children, and demonstrated KYTV's "Children's Hour", which blends home participation in arts and crafts with projects on citizenship and freedom.

Mr. Cahan described WBZ-TV's year-long "Let Freedom Ring" project, which emphasizes a different phase of freedom each month, using segments of regular shows, documentaries and frequent spot announcements.

Radio—Assignment Public Service: "Freedom"

PANEL:
Leon Goldstein, WMCA, New York
Sherwood R. Gordon, WSAI, Cincinnati
Mark Olds, KYW, Cleveland
Sam Serota, WIP, Philadelphia

CHAIRMAN: Gordon Davis, KYW, Cleveland

A strong stand in favor of editorializing by radio stations was voiced by Mr. Goldstein, who said, "If stations stand up and be counted with the same outspokenness that is true of publications, they will command the same kind of respect and loyalty from listeners and advertisers alike." Mr. Gordon described plans to institute editorials in WSAI.

Mr. Serota told of progress in breaking down barriers against coverage of such news elements as narcotics raids and minor court cases. Mr. Gordon related how his station had risen from bottom to top ratings in a single year through alert public service programming, emphasizing the complete coverage WSAI was able to set up of City Council meetings. "Broadcasters who truly serve their communities will be well rewarded," he said. "We look on public service programming as profit-sharing with our audience."

Using a recent "Voices of Freedom" documentary on two Hungarian families in Cleveland as an example, Mr. Olds said that "keeping on top of the latest news developments with special events features adds that extra touch to broadcasting that affords excitement and satisfaction."

Showmanship In Public Service Programming

PANEL:
James T. Aubrey, ABC-TV
Dr. Frank C. Baxter, University of Southern California
Louis G. Cowan, CBS
Dr. Bergen Evans, Northwestern University
William J. Kaland, WBC
Robert Saudek, Ford Foundation
Edward Stanley, NBC

CHAIRMAN: James Macandrew, Board of Education, New York

Mr. Aubrey opened the panel by suggesting that radio stations seek the tools with which to fight the inroads of TV. He contended that a "$64,000 Question" or a "Twenty-One", given the same build-up as it received on TV, could be equally successful on radio, bringing millions of listeners back to their radio sets. Mr. Cowan endorsed this view, stating, "Someday . . . someone in broadcasting will come up with a new programming idea for radio that will put it back in the mass-audience class alongside TV, instead of its being looked on as a step-child." He felt, however, that no sponsor could presently be persuaded to put up the money to promote a "$64,000 Question" exclusively on radio.

Also in support of radio, Dr. Baxter said that radio is the best medium with which to draw out the mind and develop it through public service programs. In agreeing, Dr. Evans said, "I can get ideas across to my audience much better on radio than on TV, because there are no distractions."

Exploring showmanship, Mr. Saudek stated, "I believe that the ingredient of surprise is what turns an ordinary public service program into one which you can't turn away from. People take facts for granted; they must be shocked into listening or viewing."

The panel made a strong case against talking down to audiences. "Make no concessions to the I.Q. of your audience," Mr. Stanley said . . . "don't put things in simple terms for the mass audience." Dr. Baxter said, "People have a hunger to be entertained in a specific way. They want to stand one millimeter higher than the day before." And Dr. Evans stated, "I have never talked down to an audience, or to only one segment. Reach those listening, and they will get out of it what they can."

Television News

PANEL:
Robert W. Breckner, KTTV, Los Angeles
Bill Burns, KDKA-TV
James H. Ferguson, WSAZ-TV, Huntington, W. Va.
Mike Wallace, WABD, New York

CHAIRMAN: John K. M. McCaffery
WRCA-TV, New York

"The prime motivation of TV is to present news, period, with or without visual aids," stated Mr. Wallace, expressing the feelings of the panel and delegates. He added that the success of "Night Beat" is "due in large measure to the yearning of the audience for straight talk . . . " He stated that an interview in depth requires 15 to 20 hours of research.

Mr. Breckner demonstrated the wide range of KTTV special events coverage with clips on everything from fires and floods to Navy Day and Hollywood premieres. He said the key to being able to do such coverage is that the station has had for six years a blanket contract for automatic sponsorship of all such unbilled events. "There is never a question of whether we can afford the coverage or the preemptions. We don't have to worry about mechanics or money—only whether it's a story that the people should see."

Mr. Burns stressed the importance of presenting news in an interesting and entertaining fashion, and the need for a widespread stringer set-up for complete local coverage. From the floor, Richard Pack, WBC, agreed, saying, "Local live news is one of the most precious assets we have, and certainly rates ahead of all other local programs."

Mr. Ferguson spoke of "the tremendous impact TV has on viewers, so noticeable during any emergency" and "the manner in which the viewing audience will respond and give aid during an emergency on which they have been briefed by 'their' newscaster." He described a new process which allows newsmen to shoot news in color and receive the finished film within 90 minutes, using a Polaroid camera and the proper developing equipment.

All members of Mr. McCaffery's panel emphasized wide use of film blended with local voices to cover both local and national events.

THE BOSTON CONFERENCE

They Watched and Learned . . .

Radio News

PANEL:

Robert H. Forward, KMPC, Los Angeles
Jack Kerrigan, WHO, WHO-TV, Des Moines
Daniel W. Kops, WAVZ, New Haven
Rod MacLeish, WBZ-WBZA, Boston
Gordon B. McLendon, KLIF, Dallas

CHAIRMAN: Sanford Markey, KYW, KYW-TV, Cleveland

"Radio news is offering a new sound—a sound of authority, of distinction," said Mr. Markey, setting the panel's theme. Mr. McLendon stressed the use of trained newsmen, trained to avoid mundane questions in interviews and to ask what they themselves like to know in intimate conversation. He endorsed radio editorials on subjects like capital punishment and fluoridation of water, and said, "Any station doing a top news job will find listeners feel more confidence in the station's news and advertising messages."

Mr. MacLeish urged wide integration into news copy of tapes and beeper 'phone calls, and colorful descriptions of people and places to add showmanship to newscasts. "The tape recorder," he said, "is to radio what the camera is to newspapers."

The specialized problems of providing news for both farm and urban audiences were discussed by Mr. Kerrigan, whose station programs farm news frequently and in depth to half its total audience. Mr. Forward described Sigalert, a new and unique automatic system for receiving and tape-recording emergency reports from the Los Angeles Police Department that has heightened the immediacy and excitement of news reporting on L. A. radio and TV stations.

Mr. Kops advanced the case for editorializing, saying that the station "which describes itself by editorializing and integrating itself with the wants of people, and by fighting their fights, is the station which remains distinctive." Mr. McLendon concurred, and both panelists said they not only offer equal time to those opposing the station's views, but actively seek out other viewpoints to heighten public interest in important community matters.

Children's Programs—Radio & Television

PANEL:

"Big Jon" Arthur, ABC
Gloria Chandler, KING-TV, Seattle
Jack Miller, "Captain Kangaroo"
Helen Parkhurst, Child Psychologist & Educator
Judith Waller, NBC

CHAIRMAN: Fred A. Keller, WBEN-TV, Buffalo

Mr. Keller set the panel's tone by stating, "Regardless of commercial opportunities, the broadcasting industry must continue to meet its responsibilities to the children of America. Cartoon shows, westerns and syndicated adventure series cannot support a station's claim to public service." He added that a station's time is too valuable to squander on inept programming, even if it is in cooperation with educational institutions.

Miss Waller felt that, "particularly needed on both radio and TV are more good solid programs of informational and educational value which teach children by the indirect approach." Miss Chandler agreed, and said, "Integrity, sincerity and a true love of children are vitally necessary in talent used on children's programs." Both felt that there aren't enough good children's programs.

Are TV stations exploiting children's programs for commercial gains? Mr. Miller thought not. "Producers realize more and more that programming for children is a sacred trust," he said. Mr. Arthur charged broadcasters with neglecting children's programs between 6:00 and 8:00 PM. "This time could be most effectively used as a weapon against the complaint that children spend too much of the day watching TV," he said.

Miss Parkhurst said that radio and TV can do much to interpret the adult world to children. "Often," she said, "a mother's headache or a father's business worries will reflect themselves in a sharp retort to the child, thus temporarily upsetting his little world of security. Radio and TV are the means of explaining the adult world to a child."

Luncheon

"I am unalterably opposed to censorship or to any other type of Government control over programming or over the thoughts of free men, provided the operation as a whole is conducted in the public interest.

"While you want to and must show good profits in order to perform a good service, at the same time you can and must render great public services in your own areas of operation. To become an integral part of your local community is one of your prime responsibilities. In no other manner can you become truly public servants.

"It need not take years before you give every community your stations serve a sense of 'belonging', a sense that they are receiving excellent Public Service Programming which serves their local needs.

"Long ago, we debunked the idea that programs should be shot at a 14-year-old appeal. A nation that has lifted itself as high materially as ours will certainly demand and be entitled to a comparable uplift in quality of its spare-time interest . . . "

—FCC Chairman George C. McConnaughey

"I have received hundreds of letters from parents and teachers, saying 'you have done wonderful things for education and for our family and for me. You have made me realize that having knowledge and being a learned person is not something one should be ashamed of.'

"So many people say, 'Please, let's have this in television. Let's have something that stretches us a little bit. Teach us. We want to know things.'

"Put as much reliance on universities as you can. One of the resources which can be tapped more and more is university teachers—who have to do the same thing with their careers as Gleason or Como or Lucy. They have to get the people to listen to them.

"Another resource is the university activities, classes, laboratories and the like. The university can supply information almost everybody is interested in. And it can supply interpretations of things people already know about."

—Charles Van Doren, Columbia University

Making The Most of Informational Film

PANEL:

Richard Carlton, Trans-Lux Films, Inc.
Charles F. Dolan, Sterling Movies U.S.A., Inc.
Michael Hayward, United Nations
Caleb Paine, WGY, Schenectady
John F. White, WQED, Pittsburgh

CHAIRMAN: Robert B. Hudson
University of Michigan

"Very often you can obtain genuine public service films which sharpen the things a local operation can do," said Mr. Paine. Pointing up the expense of local camera work, Mr. Dolan said, "Any partners you can get in to work in your programming area should be very helpful. In the area of free films, we have a great many partners."

Mr. Hudson pointed out that, in doing a public service job, cost or lack of cost should not be the chief criterion. "Films should be used for improvement, rather than as a filler," he added. The panelists agreed that the kind of film used and the smooth integration of it into live programming are most important. Varying lengths of informational film need be no problem if stations seek out the available local "experts" to commentate and put the film into understandable context.

Mr. Hayward described the new UN service on weekly kinescoped newsreels, giving good and bad examples of stations' use of it. Delegates showed much interest in subscribing to the service.

Concensus was summed up by Mr. Hudson, who said, "To use film and make it meaningful, give it localized flavor and involve local people in the use of it. Then you are beginning to use the potentials of local public service for which films are contemplated."

Radio—Making The Most of Special Program Services

PANEL:

Gertrude G. Broderick, U. S. Office of Education
Guy Harris, KDKA, Pittsburgh
Dorothy E. Lewis, United Nations
George E. Probst, Thomas Alva Edison Foundation
Barrie Thorne, BBC

CHAIRMAN: Seymour Siegel, WNYC, New York

Mr. Harris urged national public service agencies "to put more effort into promoting and publicizing nationally-distributed shows. Broadcasters want to be sold on the fact that their public service time is being put to the best possible use," he said. From the floor, Mr. James Quello, WJR, said, "We have found national agencies most cooperative. We feel that the responsibility for promoting and improving such a show lies with the individual station."

Mr. Thorne described a BBC transcription service on dramatic, news, music and lecture programs, and Chairman Siegel added that some 20 other nations make similar programs available to American stations. Mrs. Lewis outlined UN program services, suggesting that they be strengthened by local panel discussions among civic leaders and local UN representatives. Mrs. Broderick listed governmental agencies that produce programs for local use—some informational, some designed to produce audience action.

Mr. Probst suggested that, while most of the 5,000 charitable foundations do not have programs for local use, they can often be persuaded to produce radio programs at the local level to carry their message. Mr. Louis Corbin, WFBR, suggested that agencies haven't kept pace with basic radio industry changes, and that they should shorten programs for more ready insertion into prevailing music-and-news formats.

Religious Programming—Radio & Television

PANEL:

Albert Crews, National Council of Churches of Christ in America
Rev. Walter L. Flaherty, Catholic Archdiocese of Boston
Milton Krents, Jewish Theological Seminary
Bruce Wallace, WTMJ, Milwaukee

CHAIRMAN: Dr. Richard V. McCann, WBZ-TV, Boston

The problems facing religious broadcasters are, first, what do we say; and second, to what audiences do we say it, according to Mr. Crews. "We can preach, teach, evangelize, inform; we can create a climate of public opinion that is acceptable to various religions, and this is necessary in every community," he said.

Rev. Flaherty said, "Religious programs should be more glorified than amateur shows." He charged broadcasters with the responsibility of keeping religious shows on a high production level, and urged broadcasters to "bring religious program planners together in workshops to give them production know-how. Where this has happened, it has paid off in better, more professional religious shows."

Mr. Wallace told of a successful plan for apportioning religious programs in accordance with the number of adherents of various faiths in the community, and warned against sluffing off the responsibility of religious programming, or programming for people of the broadcaster's own faith. He made a case for as close duplication of church services on the air as possible.

Mr. Krents said, "Religious programmers shouldn't be afraid to face up to social issues. They should dramatically portray the duty of man in such fields as juvenile delinquency, segregation and the positive indictment of communism."

Dinner

"Be thoughtful in your selection of those thoughts, minds and faces which will be speaking to your newfound audience of millions. Give this responsibility to men of integrity. I charge you, as an amateur speaking to professionals, to keep the faith with your audience. Remember, your audience may be more intelligent, more mature than you think, for it was you broadcasters who made them that way. You must raise your sights, and you must weigh constantly the importance of your own public service broadcasting.

"I urge on you the word 'showmanship', though it may sound hackneyed. I urge you to be mindful of your local needs at the state, city and town levels, and I further urge you to consider long-range programming. It is not enough to live 13 weeks at a time.

"In conclusion, I beg you, do not let authoritative voices in broadcasting develop by chance. Right now, all of you should be looking for the authoritative voices and faces of tomorrow—search them out carefully."

Television Production

PANEL:

Philip H. Cohen, SSC&B
Ray W. Trent, KDUB-TV, Lubbock, Texas
Charles Vanda, WCAU-TV, Philadelphia
Arnold L. Wilkes, Hearst Radio, Inc. (AM & TV)

CHAIRMAN: William C. Dempsey, KPIX, San Francisco

Discussion started with Mr. Vanda's definition of public service programming as "first class programs with second class production and third class time slots." Mr. Trent agreed, citing "the tendency to close an eye to quality of public service programs." Money is often a problem, Mr. Cohen said, but careful planning and simple yet effective production can overcome it.

Mr. Cohen demonstrated limited animation technique that can cut costs by two-thirds; and the trick of backing a camera up and reshooting the same film to obtain supers and other optical effects. He also stressed testing public service programs just as commercial shows are tested.

Mr. Trent demonstrated the use of cameras focused on angled mirrors to give animation to titles at little cost. Hand cards can be given animation with magnets or slots. Single cell exposures and front instead of rear projection were other cost-cutting techniques he suggested.

To give public service shows the professional look with amateur talent, Mr. Wilkes suggested convincing clergymen that appearing before a camera should be handled like a house call. Every show should be controlled by at least one professional operator, he said, and the purposes of amateur efforts on TV should be spelled out for best results. National agency symbols—like the Red Feather—can be the springboard to production far livelier than stock posters would allow. Agencies appreciate such imagination from a station, Mr. Wilkes stated. He concluded, "Once you train your community to think of your station when they think of public service, they will bring in the ideas . . . far more than you can use."

The panel generally agreed that no firm budgets can be set for public service programming. Ingenuity can keep costs moderate, but, as Mr. Dempsey put it, "If the budget for a show has to be a certain amount . . . and the project warrants it . . . you are going to find the money somewhere."

Programming Concert Music

PANEL:

Martin Bookspan, WQXR, New York
Dr. Douglas S. Moore, Columbia University
Ray L. Stone, Maxon, Inc.
Melvin C. Wissman, WWJ, Detroit

CHAIRMAN: Raymond S. Green, WFLN, Philadelphia

Panel members agreed on the tremendous growth in interest in classical music in recent years. Mr. Green put it this way: "The hi-fi bug has bitten a great number of Americans, and radio stations can and should make it pay off in more listeners and more sponsors. The classical music program is probably the best example of a local public service program that can be successfully sold to both listeners and sponsors."

Several ideas for producing classical music programs were suggested. Mr. Wissman said that foreign titles scare listeners away. "Also," he said, "Many announcers scare listeners by putting an aura of intellectualism around the relatively simple task of putting on a record and saying a few words about it." Mr. Bookspan agreed, advising programmers to keep classical music language as simple as possible.

"Too much talk can ruin a classical music show," said Mr. Stone. "Take a tip from the successful DJ's, who keep their talk to a minimum and let the music do its own talking. Give your announcers an easy-to-read script. And use logic in balancing the musical selections for your programs."

How Research Can Help Public Service Programming

PANEL:

Dr. Leo Bogart, McCann-Erickson
Dr. Philip Eisenberg, Motivation Analysis, Inc.

CHAIRMAN: Melvin A. Goldberg, WBC

Opening the panel, Mr. Goldberg said, "While ratings are something we must live with, there are other sources of information that can help a station evaluate and plan its public service programs." He listed such aids as letters from listeners and viewers, sales results, public opinion polls and such special analyses as the attitude scale, a device with which listeners indicate what parts of a program they like or dislike.

"Broadcasters must evaluate public service programming in the same light as commercial programming," Dr. Bogart said. "Only in this way can we be assured of doing the best possible job in this field."

Dr. Eisenberg discussed the importance of entertainment value in public service programs and of "showmanship not just to attract audiences, but also to be an effective teacher."

Mr. Goldberg wrapped up the discussion by saying, "Look at research not as a mass of statistics and not as something infallible, but as an aid to be used by programming and sales and management. Used that way, it can do much to direct your efforts."

"Spots Before Your Eyes"

PANEL:

Arthur J. Bellaire, BBDO
William J. Kaland, WBC
Gordon C. Kinney, Advertising Council
Irvine H. Millgate, Council of National Organizations
James H. Quello, WJR, Detroit

CHAIRMAN: Franklin A. Tooke, WBZ-TV

Panelists agreed that effective public service spots are the joint responsibility of national organizations and stations. Mr. Kinney said, "It is the responsibility of the national group to give you good material." "The station that is worth its salt," said Mr. Kaland, "will look at this material and try to do it better from a local point of view."

Mr. Millgate said, "With your talents, you cannot escape your community responsibility of finding some way to advise us before spots are recorded or filmed. What is missing is your knowledge, understanding, vision and skills. I urge you to sponsor a local training program for community people."

On production, Mr. Bellaire said, "The key word in anything you do is 'idea'. You don't have to spend $14,000 for a good spot, if there is a good idea." Mr. Kaland agreed, saying, "You can sell anything with good words, including the most worthwhile public service campaign."

Mr. Tooke cited organizations "that make such vague requests for help that the stations don't know what to do. We like them to tell us what their objectives are, then depend on our know-how to translate it for our audience." Mr. Kinney stated the Ad Council's feeling by saying, "The quality of public service material is rapidly increasing . . . and at a rate faster than commercial spots."

FEBRUARY 27-28 · MARCH 1st · 1957

In the Press...

"To Westinghouse Broadcasting and its President, Donald H. McGannon, we extend a salute for conceiving and sponsoring the most significant and valuable incursion into an area which deserves the attention and study of every broadcaster."

BILLBOARD

"Just how entertainment, showmanship, excitement and enthusiasm can be injected into public service projects is being thrashed out in panel sessions headed by some of the industry's most creative people. In this search, the boys are on the right track."

Anthony LaCamera
BOSTON AMERICAN
February 28, 1957

"The Boston Conference on local public service programming conducted last week under auspices of the Westinghouse Broadcasting Company merits annual reprise as an industry innovation. Perhaps of all the 'do good' broadcast-inspired pow-wows over the year, this WBC-incepted meeting of the station program minds generated a new type of enthusiasm, perhaps even a new awareness of the tangible benefits in the area of public service."

VARIETY
March 6, 1957

"The thing which impressed me most about the TV-Radio industry's first national conference on local public service programming was the sincere attempt by a wide cross-section of commercial broadcasters to correctly evaluate their obligation to the people in whose interest they are licensed to operate. They got a lot of straight talk, and came back to meeting after meeting eager for more."

Win Fanning
PITTSBURGH POST-GAZETTE
March 4, 1957

"The highly successful 'Boston Conference,' under the auspices of Westinghouse Broadcasting Company, came to a close here on Friday with enthusiastic applause from the more than 200 public service broadcasters and educators invited to the sessions. While no announcement was made as to whether the public service conference would turn into an annual affair, the feeling around the panel sessions was that such a move on the part of WBC would be welcomed by attending members at the three-day session."

RADIO-TV DAILY
March 4, 1957

"If those who criticize broadcasting for lack of interest in public service could have been in attendance at the WBC conference, they would have hung their heads in shame."

RADIO-TV DAILY
March 11, 1957

"I remember Boston for the privilege of sitting at the ringside of television's future. Tomorrow we return to today's programming, but today (because of Boston) we look hopefully forward to tomorrow's programming. Of all the roving missions I've been on—from Virginia City to New York, from Hollywood to Chicago, from Oregon to England, this was the most satisfying. Congratulations to Westinghouse Broadcasting Company for sponsoring the Boston Conference, and to Don McGannon, its young president, for organizing it."

Dwight Newton
SAN FRANCISCO EXAMINER
March 5, 1957

"All kinds of programming were discussed, and many creative urges were undoubtedly stimulated. Westinghouse is to be congratulated for invigorating creative thinking last week and for dramatizing the value of future meetings of that kind."

BROADCASTING-TELECASTING
March 4, 1957

"The three-day meeting was obviously important in the realm of public welfare. Another important objective was to focus attention of advertisers and agencies on the role of public service programming in building the stature of a station."

SPONSOR
March 2, 1957

"Before it was all over the event was enlarged to nation-wide proportions, with many very, very important people outside the Westinghouse realm invited to attend. I would say the McGannon-Pack team really were inspired when they dreamed this one up."

Wilbur Clark
PITTSBURGH SUN-TELEGRAPH
March 2, 1957

"Public service broadcasting was given a significant boost in stature within the industry itself, as Westinghouse Broadcasting Co., which has invested heavily during recent years to upgrade its own public service efforts (and won a 1956 School Bell Award), played host at a three-day conference in Boston for the radio-TV industry on public service programming."

TRENDS IN SCHOOL PUBLIC RELATIONS
National Education Association
March 20, 1957

"This was doubtless the most successful endeavor of its kind . . . high hopes may be held for the good that can result. If WBC was entitled to the thanks of the industry for merely conceiving this conference, it is deserving all the more to its plaudits for the magnificent manner in which it carried thru."

LOCAL PUBLIC SERVICE PROGRAMMING

FEBRUARY 27-28 · MARCH 1st · 1957

AWARDED . . .

WBC has long recognized the important job national service agencies are doing to generate public interest and action for such causes as crippling disease . . . United Fund charities . . . refugee relief . . . religion . . . education . . . conservation . . . and dozens of others. We have wanted to do something to encourage these agencies to make the best possible use of the tremendous power of radio and television.

And so, WBC has created the "WBC Paul Revere Award," to be given each year to that national service agency which, in the judges' opinion, has done the outstanding job during the year in effective use of the broadcast media.

At The Boston Conference, Richard M. Pack, WBC VP-Programming, presented the first annual WBC Paul Revere Award to the National Safety Council, whose Executive Director, Ned H. Dearborn, accepted it for the Council. Speaking for his entire staff, Mr. Dearborn said, "This is one of the proudest moments in the National Safety Council's life."

The WBC Paul Revere Award is available to all national service organizations using radio and TV to project public service interests on a local basis. Each year's winner will be judged by the program managers of the WBC stations, none of which are eligible for the Award.

ANNOUNCED . . .

Among the most eloquent remarks heard at The Boston Conference were those of Senator John F. Kennedy of Massachusetts, who said, "Surveys reveal that Americans know less about their history than perhaps any other Western people. I think this is a serious shortcoming, for we cannot really understand the spirit and meaning of what is basically American unless we understand the meaning of what has gone before our time."

From this and similar points of view came the idea for a contest to stimulate programming designed to build interest in our American heritage. WBC chose the occasion of The Boston Conference to announce an annual WBC American History Award, open to all radio and television stations in the United States except WBC's own properties.

Each year's award will be $1,000, half of which will go to the station responsible for the winning program or series . . . the other half to the Historical Society in the service area of the winning station. A board of distinguished judges will pick the winner of the WBC American History Award.

In announcing the Award, WBC President McGannon pointed to "the tremendous interest the broadcasting media can engender in history, through thoughtful, creative programming on stations across the country."

ACKNOWLEDGED . . .

As The Boston Conference drew to a close, WBC realized that these meetings had unleashed forces far beyond its most hopeful dreams . . . forces that were eager to take up the challenge of exciting, resultful programming in the public interest.

WBC humbly acknowledges and broadly commends the spirit of the vast numbers of American broadcast stations which stand ready to meet this challenge —both those who participated in The Boston Conference and those whose ideals for public service programming are no less for their not being able to attend.

We believe that never in the history of broadcasting has there been a mightier confirmation of our belief that broadcasting is most effective on stations that have earned the respect and confidence of the communities they serve.

Souvenir of The Boston Conference presented to all participants.

To Meet A Challenge

THE BIG CHALLENGE of building better public service programs is to the creative men and women of radio and television—those who write, produce or plan programs. It calls for real showmanship. Now, that word "showmanship" is one of the most used, mis-used and over-used words in our business. But it's a good word. To me, it means just this: a tasteful blend of ingenuity, knowledge and imagination, applied energetically to make a show more appealing and effective.

In the long run, showmanship in educational and public service programming can flourish only in a certain kind of atmosphere. It is a tender plant that must have a continuing climate of responsibility and excitement. It needs the warmth of encouragement and the nourishment of excitement. It should also have an occasional injection of boldness.

Here and there around the country, there are still some program men who tend to minimize the public service side of their programming assignment, and treat it routinely. Their attitude tends to be cynical and patronizing.

I could say, of course, that this kind of programmer isn't smart, that he's obviously neglecting or playing down a big part of his job. But there's another important angle: the director, writer, producer or program manager who doesn't have a positive and productive attitude about public service and educational programming actually is short-changing himself. He just isn't getting as much fun out of his job as he should!

Maybe this sounds like Pollyanna stuff—that public service programming can be fun. Let's put it another way: it's here that a programmer probably can find more genuine creative satisfaction than in any other aspect of his work. The facts of life today in broadcasting are that, generally, the program manager's job has a great deal to do with operations, spots, records and films.

This is probably as it must be, and I certainly don't mean to imply that there are no creative rewards in the commercial formats of TV and radio. But very often, it's in the "public interest, convenience and necessity . . ." sustainers that you can really go to town—do that big live show, experiment with technique, try out a new concept, or a high-flying idea.

If we who are programmers are truly creative, we're in broadcasting not just because it's a good living, but for something more, too—for the razzle-dazzle, the huzzas and hoorahs, and for that warm and wonderful satisfaction that comes a few seconds after the show has gone off the air and someone says, "Hey, that was good!" We're in this fine, frenzied business because we're craftsmen and creators—and dreamers.

At the WBC stations, we think we have the kind of program and production people who are getting that kind of creative satisfaction. They're excited about public service programming. We hope their enthusiasm is contagious.

Dear Ed:

You may have heard that, effective December 13th, I resigned from The Joseph Katz Company. On January 2nd, I joined this agency as Executive Vice President-Administration.

Knowing you, I am sure you will find it easy to understand the difficulty I experienced in severing connections with people with whom I had been associated for 24 years. However, and unfortunately, there arise occasions which make a change desirable. This is what happened to me.

At your convenience, I would like to spend a little time with you to tell you of my plans for the future and, at the same time, discuss with you "Small World."

I had a meeting with Tom Dawson this past week at which time he told me of your interest in this program. He is sending a film, which I hope to have this week. Until I see this film, I must depend on what I have heard. From the way Tom described it to me, it sounds like an excellent program, one for which I would like to be able to find a sponsor.

I am going to take the liberty of calling you one day this coming week in the hope we may be able to arrange to have lunch or dinner and at the same time talk about my future plans and "Small World." never called

Dear Mr. Murrow:

As chairman of the Board of the Community Service Society, I'd like to bring you up to date on some activities of the past year which your generosity helped make possible.

In this report letter you will notice that as always our activities are all aimed toward one goal - strengthening family life. The little booklet, "What Makes For Strong Family Life," which we sent you recently spells out this goal. There was such widespread demand for copies that the Family Service Association of America is reprinting it for distribution all over the country.

Our play, "Broken Circle," is also receiving national acclaim. It was produced to answer the often-asked question - "Just how do you work with families?" I hope you have had an opportunity to see this play which shows how a caseworker helps a family threatened with breakdown.

You will be interested in a current demonstration aimed at preventing breakdown - our project at Public School 184. We are working with the Board of Education to find out why so many children who are good students in elementary grades do poorly in later grades; get into trouble, and finally drop out. Fifty-five third-grade children have been selected and we are proceeding along two lines: First, we are working with the children and their families on personal problems which might cause later drop-outs. Second, with the school, we are developing a program of academic enrichment. Each child is being given the particular help he needs in his school work; CSS volunteers are arranging trips to museums and places of interest; coaching is being given on special subjects and we are collecting books for homes in which there have never been books. By this two-pronged approach, we believe we can prevent the waste of school drop-outs of students with strength and capacity.

Meanwhile, the Society is carrying on a comprehensive study of its own services, as any dynamic agency in a constantly changing city should do periodically. Under the leadership of Mr. Bayard Pope, honorary chairman of the Board, and Mr. Frank J. Hertel, general director of the Society, we are studying the needs of the city now and for the next five to ten years to determine which of these needs CSS should and can meet. I will report to you on this again.

One thing we know without studying, however, as we begin our 111th year - our responsibilities are mounting. More and more requests for service are pouring in and every CSS unit has a waiting list of people wanting help. To meet these responsibilities, the Board of Trustees adopted a budget of $3,727,789 for the year and approved a goal of $1,500,000 for our annual Family Fund campaign now underway. These goals are high but with increased demands for CSS service, we had no other choice. Many of you are working wholeheartedly to make the campaign a success - continued evidence of your belief in the Society.

The officers of the Society join me in expressing to all of you our sincere appreciation for your part in making the past year one of such worthwhile accomplishment. With your continued partnership, the Society will push ahead in furthering the well-being of the people of New York.

Sincerely,

Keith S. McHugh

Chairman of the Board
Community Service Society

You are well aware that CSS not only helps with individual problems but that we have a proud history of tackling conditions to make this a better town in which to live and work. In my report letter last year I told you about a step in this direction taken by our Family Services Division when we relocated a group of families that everyone had despaired of moving out of their dilapidated tenement to permit the erection of a new housing project. Our report, "Not Without Hope," recently published by our Committee on Housing, is having repercussions in cities all over the country because the question of what can be done for seemingly immobilized families in order to make way for improved housing is plaguing officials and communities everywhere. The Committee on Housing is pressing for the adoption of its recommendations by appropriate government agencies.

Many government officials and civic groups depend on our Committee on Public Affairs to study and render opinions on legislative proposals affecting family welfare that are introduced at the City, State and Federal levels. This year again the Committee gave generously of time and experience in studying a wide range of bills introduced in the State Legislature and Congress and ably served as spokesman for CSS on legislative matters on which a family agency properly wants to take action.

This next year promises to be particularly active and useful not only to families served directly by CSS but to all families. Two public health projects are already in the final "shaping-up" period. One of them will attempt to see whether well-rounded public health nursing can reduce the destructive rate of perinatal death of infants (deaths occurring between the fourth month of the mother's pregnancy and one week after the baby is born). This demonstration, which should have widespread effect on hospitals and health centers, will be conducted at Metropolitan Hospital. Another project conducted at Goldwater Hospital has to do with elderly people who are released from the hospital after one of the serious illnesses that so often come with aging - a stroke, a broken hip, a heart attack - and who need special services at home if they are to maintain their gains and not have to go back into the hospital.

Dear Mr. Murrow,

I'd like to pose a problem and ask a favor. And this is not exactly an idle query! S omething extremely important may flow from it.

There are a few intellectuals no doubt across the world who share my view that such instrumentalities of diplomacy as

TREATIES . . . PACTS . . ALLIANCES

DISARMAMENTS . . . COLLECTIVE SECURITIES . .

AND BALANCES OF POWER . .

are utterly obsolete, and impotent when used today to establish a basis for truly lasting world peace among the human family.

Assuming there are such persons who share the above view, where does one find them? How might I contact them?

I'm thinking of top level people across the Free World .. thinkers, historians, authors, educators, political, social and other scientists who want to see an utterly new, FRESH APPROACH made to the problem of recurring warfare.

Would you be willing to ask your correspondents abroad .. and here at home .. to try and supply me with the names, identity and current addresses of such persons? I may need to contact them soon. And I'd like to have at least the identify of two such persons from each of the nations, large and small, throughout the FreeWorld. I might want to invite them to Dallas before New Years! Some day, I'll tell you why . . if!

Is this asking to cmuch, great man!

Always grateful for your massive contributions to CBS News and to the American people,

Dear Mr. Murrow:

I have recently received a letter from Dr. Billy Graham stating in reference to the late Senator Joseph McCarthy: "When Ed Murrow exposed him on television, I wrote him a note of congratulation. While I agreed with the need of exposing Communists in this country, yet I felt we were in danger of drifting toward a radical witch-hunting demagogy."

I have just completed a book-length study of Dr. Graham which is to be published shortly. In this study I charged Dr. Graham with having given at least indirect support to Senator McCarthy's activities. Consequently, in the interest of fairness and accuracy, I would like to know whether Dr. Graham, in congratulating you on your expose, was as explicit as his letter to me indicates. If so, I will of course include this fact in my book and will ask his permission to quote from his letter to you which apparently he kept no copy of. I would greatly appreciate your help in this matter.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Possibly you are familiar with the following quotation:

> There is always work, and tools > to work withal, for those who will.

In America today there is somewhere in the neighborhood of 5 million jobless persons who well might question those "words to live by." (J.R. Lowell A Glance Behind the Curtain)

Countless numbers of the 60 million still drawing regular pay checks, uneasy about our recession, also may believe the wisdom of those words is debatable.

Yet there is still a remnant of that dwindling breed of American to whom those words ring loud and true.

Frankly I am a public relations man playing a long shot. I believe you may sense that here is a timely and inspiring "story," one you may wish to pursue "in person."

My subject, one of the smallest of small businessmen, not only has "lived by" those words for 30 years, but has defied all the "conventional rules" in doing so. Three years ago at the age of 50, he quit the security of a good paying job, one he probably could have held the rest of his working life, to go into business for himself.

The startling part of this story is the nature of that business. A newspaperman all his life--one who never had had a trowel in his hand--he went into business manufacturing a product to repair concrete.

His eyes were wide open. He knew the risks. Most failures are due to lack of experience and reserve capital. He never had met a pay roll, had very little capital, yet here he was launching a new product in a new field.

There is drama in the creation of that product. He had to start from scratch: Dream up a name for it, design an attractive package, set up a production system. Setting up a sales policy was not difficult, but the job of selling was. There was skepticism to overcome. Old timers in the business 20-30 years will tell you they never heard of anything that will hold a new top on old concrete. Today Fix-Crete is being sold by dealers all over Indiana and in each of the four neighboring states.

Afraid of economic slowdown? No. A matter of simple arithmetic. Even though another million are added to the jobless there still will be 60 million working. They will want to keep up the appearance of their homes. Most will tend to repair rather than build new. Seniority workers still will be on jobs. They are the ones who own homes. All will want to save dollars.

A touch of religion is good for any story, and here is an example of the efficacy of prayer. One of the first jobs done by a professional with the new product was a failure. You can imagine the impact: Everything invested in a dud? Complainant had hardly left the office when the phone rang. A dealer wanted a re-order. When delivery was made his greeting was: "Say fella, that must be pretty good stuff you have. It's a relief to put in a new product and have your customers come back praising it and asking for more."

Found out later what the trouble was. Also, that there is nothing yet made that will prevent a job from being bungled. Most Fix-Crete jobs are done by amateurs, yet complaints are remarkably few.

Odd feature about advertising: Designed to attract women. The leading department store in Indianapolis (L.S. Ayres & Co) stocked the new product "to help a local lad get started." This is hardly the place one would expect to buy anything of this nature. Buyer took a dozen cans, expecting them to last all summer. To his amazement, the dozen cans went out in two days, mostly to women shoppers browzing through the department. This also is an example of how attractive packaging can help a product.

A check of mail inquiries showed 80% were signed by women. Our theory is that women haven't been told you "can't." Too, women are more concious of the appearance of the home. And women read directions, whether it's for a new hairdo, recipe for a cake, or using Fix-Crete.

Touch of humor: Subject recently took up duplicate bridge, attended his first out of town tournament and won a trophy. A few days later, playing with some cronies at the club, " modestly" let it be known he had won his first trophy. About that time he made a rather stupid play. His partner scathingly asked him whether he had won the trophy as a door prize.

A curious part of this story is the fact that one of your sponsors is responsible for it. A few years ago Life Magazine ran a two-page spread on a product called Coprox. The interest aroused by that article led to the research which uncovered the formula for Fix-Crete.

A devotee of your program, there are, naturally, many I have missed. However, I cannot ever recall a program actually emanating from Indianapolis.

Yours sincerely,

W C McNicholl

I thought you would be interested in reading the following excerpts from a letter Mr. Paley received recently from Mr. Henry Edwards Schultz, National Chairman of the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith:

"I have the great pleasure of informing you that, by vote of the National Commission of the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith, the Columbia Broadcasting System has been selected to receive the 1958 America's Democratic Legacy Silver Medallion for distinguished contributions to the enrichment of America's heritage of freedom.

"The medal is awarded annually on the basis of the recipient's record of service to the nation. The determination this year was to make the awards in the fields of communication. In addition to the Columbia Broadcasting System, therefore, the medal has been voted to The New York Times and Look Magazine.

"In past years, the medal has been received by a number of distinguished citizens and organizations including two Presidents of the United States, the Congress of the United States and the Carnegie, Ford, and Rockefeller Foundations. In 1949, the medal was awarded and received by President Harry S. Truman and in 1953 by President Dwight D. Eisenhower. Last year, you may recall, the Award was made to the 85th Congress for passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1957 and was received on behalf of the Congress by the Congressional leaders of the two parties.

"In selecting the 1958 award winners, the National Commission of the League seeks to give recognition to their long and distinguished service in maintaining an informed public on the subjects of civil liberties, civil rights and human relations. For today more than ever before America is being tested before the world by its devotion to the ideals and heritage of freedom, whose practical expression is revealed in the state of our intergroup relationships and in our adherence to the basic rights, liberties and responsibilities of a democratic society."

Dr. Stanton will accept the CBS award at ceremonies which will be broadcast as part of the CBS Television Network presentation THE AMERICAN JEW, Sunday, December 7, 11:30 AM-12:30 PM, WCBS-TV, Channel 2.

Dear General Medaris:

I write to thank you for your gracious letter of December 31 and to say that I feel the need for further and prolonged conversation with you, whenever the opportunity affords.

My schedule for the first week in March is entirely flexible and, if you would have your aide communicate with me at any time of the day or night, I will make myself available at once.

Please convey my warmest regards to Mrs. Medaris.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

I greatly appreciate your thoughtfulness in sending us a season's remembrance, and one that will serve as a consistent reminder of the memorable night on which we appeared on your program.

I also want you to know how much I enjoyed our conversation in New York on my last visit. In my own experience it is quite rare to encounter an individual who so completely combines realism with a deep thoughtfulness. The result of such a rare encounter is always stimulating.

I appreciate your personal invitation to visit your farm and hope that circumstances may permit me to take advantage of it. In the meantime, I am looking forward to your finding an opportunity to visit with us here or perhaps at the Cape. I do not know what your schedule for the first week in March might be but this might turn out to be a convenient time.

Mrs. Medaris joins me in asking that you extend our personal regards to Jess Zousmer.

Dear Mr. Murrow;

It occurred to me this morning to send you some satirical verses I just wrote on a serious subject, sound detection. I thought you might be able to use your considerable amount of influence against sound detection. I am sure you would if you could know of what I, for one, have suffered from it for the past quarter century.

I will enclose another thing I wrote lately, "Man Trapped By Machines".

You are so right about the things you have to say about those who practice sound detection for devious, underhanded, un-American or illegal purposes.....Please let me know about any transgressions of this sort.... We're rockin' and rollin' in secret "sound detection",

Dear Mr. Murrow:

REUTHER PROPOSES PROFIT SHARING PLAN FOR INDUSTRY

This news has highlighted and centered America's attention on the concept and practical application of profit sharing.

We are writing you as to the possibility of your interest in exploring and perhaps explaining just what profit sharing is to your viewing audience. There are approximately 25,000 plans in existence today, over 4,000 of which were started within the last two years. Yet, the one rather interesting fact is that no two people (except those in the plans) seem to have a clear cut idea of just what Profit Sharing is.

I represent the Council of Profit Sharing Industries, a non profit corporation, formed over ten years ago to promote the idea of profit sharing and to disseminate information on how it works and what it does. Our membership ranges from firms with 19,000 employees to firms with three employees.

Our letterhead can give you some idea of the caliber of the men and companies who believe in profit sharing.

While I realize your interest would be to our advantage, I also believe that you would be making the American public aware of a concept that is as close to home for them as their paycheck and as interesting and timely as your studies in automation and the Kasper story.

If you are interested in exploring this idea further, you can contact me at our Chicago office, FRanklin 2-3267.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

I have been a viewer of many of your television programs and recently watched your interview with the President of the Federation of Women's Clubs at the Washington, D. C. headquarters. It was an excellent program and I thought you would be interested in knowing about another possible program for your series, "See It Now". In fact, I am sure that more than 140,000 university women (and their families) would be very pleased if you could interview the President of The American Association of University Women.

The American Association of University Women invites you to join with other college alumnae, women of similar background and training, in a program devoted to—application of the training and abilities of college women to the complex problems of modern life

The American Association of University Women was founded in 1882, in the hope that women college graduates, by working together, might open doors in education that were closed to women and widen opportunities for college women to use their training. The founders described the Association's purpose in the simple phrase, "practical educational work."

From that first little group of pioneers — 17 women from 8 colleges — the Association has grown to over 111,000 members representing 271 institutions of higher learning. "Practical educational work" is carried out in a broad program that might be described as "putting education to work practically." That purpose guides the work of more than 1,100 local branches and 48 state divisions.

An approved degree from an institution approved by the Association is the requisite for AAUW membership.

The Association very early found that it could exert a real influence on higher education for women by requiring an institution to meet certain standards before its graduates could be admitted to membership. The requirements developed through the years include: good academic standards, adequate provision for women students, recognition of women on the faculty and in the administration, and a good foundation of general education.

Many institutions have broadened general education requirements for specialized degrees, given more adequate recognition to women, and taken other steps to meet these requirements, in order to enable their graduates to join the AAUW.

the International Federation

Through the International Federation of University Women, AAUW members are also members of an organization which unites university women around the world. In 1950 there were 34 federations.

The International Federation is a vital force for international understanding, providing contacts between university women in many countries, furthering exchange of ideas, and giving a channel for united effort in behalf of common ideals.

Through its local, state, and national units, the Association watches developments related to its interests, and brings the influence of the organization to bear on officials and policy-making bodies when action is in order.

■ The Association supports a Legislative Program voted by the biennial convention which includes such measures as federal aid to public education, steps to secure cooperation among nations, and legislation to promote social and economic well-being at home and to do away with discriminations against women. State and local units work for local legislation along similar lines. Always the emphasis is on education to develop informed opinion as a basis for action.

■ The AAUW frequently finds occasion to remind government officials that well qualified women are available for public service, and recommends them for appointment to national and international bodies.

■ The Association is also a spokesman for educated women in other fields. Believing that the opinions of college alumnae regarding higher education are important, AAUW asked its members to evaluate their own college experience. The 30,000 returns received, together with conclusions of discussion groups will furnish valuable guidance for planning college offerings for women.

Countless branches have surveyed needs of the public schools, interpreted problems of education to the general public, and led the way in steps to meet such problems. Many have cooperated with the schools in offering vocational and educational guidance; and higher education has been a subject of much animated study.

international relations groups provide a means of gaining background on problems of international cooperation and other issues involved in this country's crucial foreign-policy decisions. AAUW groups contribute to informed public opinion on such issues through open meetings, public forums, radio broadcasts, news stories, and supplying leadership for other groups. the Fellowship Program

The Association gives aid to American women scholars and to university women of other countries through fellowships and international grants.

■ Believing that well-qualified women are themselves the best argument for the advancement of women, AAUW offers graduate fellowships to encourage promising women scholars. Approximately 30 awards of from $1,500 to $2,500 are given each year. A million-dollar fellowship endowment fund is now almost completed.

■ In the 60 years since the first fellowship was given in 1890, some 450 women have been helped through these awards to take their places in the ranks of college administrators, teachers, research investigators, writers, and other professions. Often this AAUW assistance has been the turning point in a distinguished career.

■ Since 1945, the AAUW has also given international grants to women from countries that suffered from the war. Each year, these grants have enabled from 35 to 50 women to study in the United States. They have come from 20 countries.

■ AAUW international students gain professional training here that is put to use in rebuilding their homelands. They learn to know America, and the bonds of friendship and understanding thus created are a practical contribution toward world cooperation and peace.

to join the AAUW

Degrees from 271 American colleges and universities are accepted as a basis for membership. The membership chairman of the AAUW branch or the Dean of your college will gladly check your degree with the list issued by the Association; or write to AAUW Headquarters, stating your college and degree, and ask for an application card.

Membership in AAUW gives you the opportunity to join with more than 111,000 other women college graduates in a practical, constructive contribution to the functioning of our democracy. By enrolling in a local branch you are enabled to take part in branch activities that are stimulating to the individual and helpful to the community. In local groups, recent graduates and experienced leaders, professional women and homemakers, cooperate in worthwhile work of a high caliber, with pleasant by-products of congeniality and friendship.

To enroll in a branch, contact the branch president or membership chairman.

If there is no local branch in your vicinity, you may become a member-at-large. You will receive the quarterly Journal and be privileged to attend conventions, and you will be helping to maintain the Association's program. For this type of membership, send the application card and dues to —

Dear Mr. Murrow:

I certainly appreciated and found most interesting your remarks on the problems of communicating with peoples in the under-developed countries. Your comments have stirred a good deal of interest among those who heard them last Wednesday afternoon.

We, at the University, have been working with others on the proposed African Trade and Travel Fair for the past year. It has, in our opinion, a good deal of merit and we regard it as a very good means to communicate the political, economic and moral implications of the African continent to the American peoples.

I am enclosing a copy of the January, 1958 issue of the Shield. You may be interested in my article "Values in Foreign Aid" which begins on page 16.

Again sincere congratulations on your address. I remain,

Values in foreign aid programs

Have Americans any obligation to help the newly developing countries of the world?

By Thomas P. Melady, Ph.D.

CONGRESS RECENTLY DEBATED the Foreign Aid Program. Now that the political storm has subsided, let's take a clear look at this program. What is it—and why should we sink our money into it?

From a purely practical standpoint, foreign aid is of great importance. The United States is dependent upon sources outside its boundaries for 75 minerals which are vital to its industrial and military strength. The newly developing countries of Africa, South America, and Asia provide most of these raw materials. If we are to maintain our strength against the Soviet threat, it is imperative that we aid these countries and keep the resources we need out of Soviet hands.

Historically, a contributing cause of the rise of demagogues is the inability of newly developing countries to make any significant improvement in their standard of living. Despotism seems always to be dangerous to the free world—the cutting off of Iran's oil supply from the rest of the world a few years ago is a case in point. Foreign aid and technical assistance get newly developing countries on their

EDITORS' NOTE: In the propaganda hubbub that attended the launching of the artificial satellite, now dubbed Sputnik, by Russian scientists and military men, only a few voices were heard to say that the Soviet might be attempting to obscure some of the failures of Communism as the 40th anniversary of the Bolshevik revolution approached. One was the voice of a commentator on the newly rebuilt Vatican radio, Station HVJ, who warned that "to be distracted from the aims of Communism is tantamount to collaboration with it."

Another admonishing voice was that of the magazine Life (October 21, "Common Sense and Sputnik"), reminding the U.S.A. that, while it should not lag in the competition with Communism, our country has an "older, grander mission . . . to make this world more habitable . . . and to keep the light of freedom and reason accessible to all our fellow men."

To fulfill this "older, grander mission," the United States needs a motivation of the highest order, which can be found only in religion—the readiness to help other people (and other nations) because they have rights to the use of the good things of earth, given to them by Almighty God, who created both the good things and the people.

Governments of nations must operate with secular means to achieve good results, but the individuals who join in such operations will work better if they are inspired by religious motives. These motives are Christian concepts of charity and justice. They are not different, at bottom, from those that inspire us to engage in works that Christians commonly recognize as "missionary," because they rest on love of fellow men which is Christ-like.

In the accompanying article, Dr. Thomas P. Melady, foreign trade adviser with the International Cooperation Administration in Ethiopia for two years, illustrates how the foreign aid program of the Unted States has exemplified this spirit—and the motives behind such a spirit.

LIBERIA: U. S. Point Four diagnostic laboratory teacher instructs two public health lab technician trainees on proper use of microtome.

own feet and lessen the possibility of despotic control.

If the United States is to maintain her economy, she must have markets for her finished products. In helping other countries raise their standard of living, we are also expanding their purchasing power and making new markets for ourselves.

A good example of just what the foreign aid program does is found in Ethiopia. This gateway to central and southern Africa is of strategic importance to the free world. The country is also important for its exports of coffee, hides, oil, and gold.

A technical assistance program was launched in Ethiopia in 1952 to help the government train the people it severely needs to develop the country's rich natural resources. The United States furnishes the specialists and the Ethiopian government provides the counterpart personnel, the land and the buildings. The program also offers opportunities for training abroad, usually in the United States. Training is given in agriculture, water resources, education, public health and sanitation, commerce and industry, and public administration.

In this manner, in Ethiopia and other countries like it, the United States assures herself of raw materials, new markets, and a strategically located friend in the struggle against Communism.

These are practical, self-interested motives for the foreign aid program. But there is another reason, often neglected, of equal or greater importance.

The strong, wealthy nations of the world have an obligation in charity and social justice to aid these countries struggling for existence. Christian principles require that each nation cooperate with others for the common good of all. Since the free world claims to be defending a world order founded upon moral principles, it cannot deny this obligation.

How far is the United States going into this foreign aid matter and how far should it go?

The Communist military threat is a fact of life. It would seem, therefore, that as long as this threat exists, it should be United States policy to continue the mutual defense assistance program. Furthermore, economic aid for defense, for development and for emergency situations appears to be a sensible way of protecting United States interests. Such aid was used several years ago to keep Iran from going bankrupt and possibly falling into Communist hands. The cost of this emergency aid to Iran was around 60 million dollars. Since this aid was largely responsible for keeping Iran, with its strategic location and oil reserves, on our side of the world struggle, this investment of American funds should be considered a good bargain. Such aid has been used for similar purposes in Bolivia and Guatemala.

Most of the arguments for justifying foreign aid will continue to be in INDIA: Millions of acres of new land are being opened to cultivation through irrigation from huge dams and deep tube wells like this one.

LIBYA: A forester drills holes for tree planting where the Tripolitanian dune area is now being reforested.

VIET NAM: Vietnamese children now enjoy clean water from a village pump built by U. S. technicians.

One woman, sentenced to fifteen years' imprisonment, told us that she had "sent secrets to Chiang Kai-shek." In answer to our question she said that the secrets were "political, military and economic." We asked her how the secrets had been transmitted, and she informed us that she had sent them by telegram!

Anxious to discover something of police powers and methods, we requested when in Shanghai to meet an official of the Police Department, and a Mr. Ho, the Chief of the Maintenance of Security Section of the Bureau of Public Security, was brought to our hotel where we spent some two hours in obtaining information from him.

We questioned firstly on the right of the prisoner to refuse to answer the questions posed during the investigation. We were informed that "the prisoner has the right to refuse to speak. But if we have evidence that a person has committed a crime, it does not mean that if he keeps silent he will escape punishment." We were informed that "generally speaking it is natural for them at the beginning to refuse to speak and to admit the crimes they have committed. But after we have explained to them the lenient policy of the State, i.e., if you confess you will be treated with lenience; if you have done some merit you will be allowed to go unpunished; if you have done great merit you will be rewarded, the prisoner will usually confess to many things."

This "explanation of the lenient policy of the State"—the better term is brain washing—will go on for a period of "from three to five days." However, "if the prisoner insists on innocence and we have the fact, the time taken may be a little longer."

In all the cases of which Mr. Ho had personal experience the prisoners had, all of them, confessed, and all of them pleaded guilty at their trial.

In China religion must serve politics. Of that there no doubt. But somewhere every religion that is worth anything must draw the line.

It is easy to understand why the Chinese Government should have such a policy. Why it cannot tolerate a religion. For religion is not only the burning of incense before the Buddhist pagoda, it is not only the act of singing before the altar of the Chinese, it is not only the attending of services. Religion is more. It is the belief in a certain authority. That is why every religion which is a real religion . . . appears to a Communist Government to be a usurpation.

The "Patriotic Church" is the only Church in China today which enjoys any semblance of freedom. But even this Red-founded church has no real freedom. It is tolerated for one purpose only—it is a useful tool for the complete and final eradication of real religion. Let me give an illustration. A doctor wishes to save his patient from small-pox. How does he go about it? He gives his patient a small, controlled dose of smallpox It is the surest way to save him from the real disease. That is what is being done in China today. There is being administered by the government a small, controlled dose of Communist religion. They think that this is the most effective way of getting rid of religion altogether.

Religious freedom in China today? There is bitter persecution of every real religion in an insidious campaign to destroy all religion. Here subtle—there blatant; but everywhere one of the most violent persecutions the Christian Church has faced in the two thousand years of its history.

the area of "national interest." Perhaps in the future, taking cognizance of the moral implications, it might be better to help the people of the newly developing areas mainly because we have a moral responsibility to do so!

As Christians we are also concerned about the peoples in these areas because most of them are not Christians. Within our generation we may be given the opportunity of converting millions of Asians and Africans to Christianity. We can only hope to accomplish this if these areas remain free from Communist domination. Both as citizens of the United States and as Christians it would seem that the only choice is to work for improved political and economic conditions in the newly developed areas. By doing this we can help to assure that these lands will remain a part of the free world, and their people free candidates to receive the Christian message.

Vocation prayer

Is it possible to pray for "the missions" and "for vocations" without ever thinking that our prayers may have some reaction upon ourselves? For example, could we be the ones for whom we are asking Almighty God to give vocations to service in His Church? How many students who pray for the missions and for vocations actually contemplate that they, themselves, may be falling within the scope of answer to their prayers?

This very interesting topic of discussion was brought up at the meeting of representatives from major seminaries affiliated with the CSMC, at Cincinnati in August, 1957, and as a result, a resolution was adopted which included this clause:

"Form a prayer committee to write original vocation prayers for possible circulation in other groups, through the National CSMC Center." The offer was made by Father Henry J. Klocker, Assistant National Secretary, to see that good prayer texts submitted by seminarians would be put into circulation, if adaptable to other groups, especially in high schools. Father Klocker also promised that appropriate ecclesiastical approval would be obtained for any prayers so published, it being understood that, in each case, the seminarians writing the prayers would first of all obtain permission from their own superiors.

The first entry to reach the offices of The Shield came from Rev. Mr. Frank Sanfelippo, a student in the major department of St. Francis Seminary, Milwaukee. This is the text of his prayer:

"O Lord, Divine Giver of all gifts, with a fervent heart and mind, I pray and ask You to enlighten my mind and direct my will to that state in life in which I will show my love by serving You best and insure my eternal happiness with You. Amen."

The editors of The Shield will be pleased to receive other entries of this type and, if they are sufficiently original and adaptable to other groups of students, they will be published. Should a sufficient number of such prayers be written, the proposal was held out that subsequently they might be included in a special prayer book to be issued to CSMC schools.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

May I call your attention to the timely importance of the recently announced study at Columbia University, "Inspection for Disarmament." A group of specialists found technical workability for enforcing many types of international agreements on limited as well as extensive disarmament.

This subject now becomes of increasing importance owing to the beginning of the meetings at Geneva on this subject.

In the interest of informed public discussion of these matters, may I indicate that I would be pleased to be helpful to you in arranging for appropriate treatment of this subject on your programs.

Under separate cover I am sending you a copy of the book "Inspection for Disarmament."

You can reach me at Columbia at UNiversity 5-4000, Extension 2367, or failing that, a message will be taken for me at Extension 391.

Sincerely yours,

Seymour Melman

The Feasibility of Disarming

By Robert C. Cowen

Inspection For Disarmament. Edited by Seymour Melman. New York. Columbia University Press. 291 pp. $6.

According to knowledgeable natural scientists, the world now is faced with the most fateful crisis of history. The technological means for seriously mutilating if not destroying the human race are at hand. In their opinion and for this reason, it is imperative to avoid nuclear war.

This book is an unofficial and unclassified, but thoroughly competent, study of the feasibility of disarmament, which would be one way of avoiding that kind of war. More accurately, it is a study of the workability of means to enforce such a disarmament through inspection.

Professor Melman's book is part of a broad technical, legal, and political study of the problem of disarmament. It deals specifically with the technical aspects of inspection and consists mainly of study papers contributed by a number of experts plus a summary and commentary by the editor.

The analyses in the book are hardheaded, its conclusions are optimistic. It is of tremendous significance for all mankind.

In brief, Professor Melman concludes that inspection of limited or even general disarmament is feasible even though it can never be foolproof. The following quotes state his case succinctly:

"It is not possible . . . to design and operate a system by which perfect compliance with international disarmament agreements could be guaranteed. Let it be clear . . . that perfection cannot be guaranteed here, nor in any natural or social phenomenon. Indeed, foolproof and flawless reliability of inspection for disarmament is not only unattainable; it is not necessary for workability.

"Stated another way, the gains that could be obtained for the security of humankind by the relaxation of the arms race are so substantial as to be well worth the risks of successful evasion that may be involved in concluding disarmament agreements."

The Melman study deals with general disarmament with an especially close look at long-range missiles. In this way, Professor Melman says, the inspection thesis was put to the broadest, most difficult test. However, its conclusions and methods could be readily adapted for the simpler job of evaluating inspection of a limited disarmament agreement.

The Melman group worked without the benefit of secret information. However, there is much pertinent data available, so that their analyses are meaningful. In this connection, it is significant that the recent East-West Geneva conference on means of inspecting a bomb-test ban has borne out the Melman study's conclusions, at least in a limited area.

This study is more an aid to thinking and debate than it is a definitive analysis. There are many complex factors to be weighed and many more studies will be needed before the problems have been thoroughly enough explored for decisions to be made.

For example, Professor Melman cites difficulties in detecting clandestine attempts to avoid a disarmament agreement when these attempts are made by a determined group with governmental support. He would partly cancel out these difficulties by trying to build up a citizen "conscience" that would encourage the people themselves to report such violations of an agreement as part of their higher duty to mankind. Is this a realistic expectation or not? It will take more than the Melman study to find out or even to provide a good basis for judgment.

Nevertheless, the Melman study is a significant start in authoritative and informed public appraisal of the disarmament-inspection question. It is must reading for everyone seriously interested in this momentous issue.

Spadework in Garden of Survival

"Inspection for Disarmament," edited by Seymour Melman (Columbia University Press. 308 pp. $6), is an analysis of the disarmament problem with recommendations for international outlawing of nuclear weapons. The study is evaluated by Robert Rienow, who is a professor of Political Science at the State University of the New York College for Teachers and the author of "Calling All Citizens."*

By Robert Rienow

AN IMPRESSIVE galaxy of scientific and management experts with compasses, surveying instruments, and computers cannot by themselves slash out a new road for mankind free of the threat of international banditry. This conclusion is underlined by the thorough analysis sponsored by the Institute of War and Peace Studies entitled "Inspection for Disarmament," edited by Seymour Melman. Nor was it the purpose of this volume to set up a magic-eye system of peace by enlisting technology on the side of disarmament.

Under the foundation support of Mr. Earl D. Osborn and the Institute of International Order, the editor solicited eighteen technical papers which make up Part II of the study. "To what extent," each expert was asked, "can the most advanced techniques in your specialized area be used to enforce an international disarmament agreement, full or partial?" What are the capabilities and limitations of aerial inspection? Can disarmament be controlled by mathematical sleuthing in the ledgers of national budgets? What risk is there of having peaceful fissionable material purloined for military purposes? These are samples of the technical spadework that has turned up a garden full of authoritative information.

Professor Melman, with skill and brevity, has drawn such hope and drafted such designs of disarmament as the scientific wisdom he has recruited will sustain. The entire study is built on an assumption "that a disarmament agreement would help to preserve the human species, and to prevent a world holocaust." The thesis here is that nations might be induced to disarm—at least partially—if they felt any assurance that the move was mutual.

Yet, is this fear of a double-cross the major stumbling-block to disarmament? Is it not rather that nation-states, almost by definition, lack the political machinery (and the will to create it) for peacefully resolving their conflict of interests? Would, therefore, even the most confident insistence that inspection techniques made disarmament enforceable aid in denting the armor of nation-states? It is the dogma of nationalism and the worship of sovereignty which remain the basic obstacles to disarmament and its effective policing.

Indeed, the weaknesses "inherent in an inspection system which places primary emphasis on the inspection of physical things," Professor Melman seeks to attack with "inspection by the people."

"Inspection by the people" turns out to be a political plea for a supranational allegiance that would make individual betrayal of national clandestine operations a kind of international patriotism. "It is invaluable," he says, "to develop understanding and allegiance that cross national boundaries. Widespread allegiance to ideals of peaceful living and humanitarian methods would undermine the nationalist appeals of any major effort to evade a world-wide disarmament agreement."

A six-nation poll (U. S., Britain, France, West Germany, India, and Japan) made in March, 1958 (if taken at face value) surprisingly indicates that eighty per cent of all Americans—and a similar percentage in the others—would report the secret manufacture of forbidden weapons by their own country. This poll, however, is flimsy evidence; alter, for instance, one circumstance so that the Middle East becomes a Soviet satellite by subversion—and the ensuing fright and petroleum famine would change the picture entirely. The study admits that the possibility of "inspection by the people" within the Soviet sphere is a decidedly doubtful factor.

Yet this study has cleared out much of the suspended technical silt in the disarmament test tube. We now know, for instance, that monitoring stations at 300 mile intervals—twenty-five in the Soviet Union and seven in the United States—would be relatively effective in detecting nuclear bomb tests. We have hopeful scientific appraisal of aerial inspection techniques. We have verification of the weaknesses of critical production controls. We are prodded to act now on missile limitations because missile nests will be as hard to find as "manhole covers from 50,000 feet in the air."

This timely and objective volume brings light to dark places. It may even bring Mr. Dulles to revise his July 3 assertion that the problems of preventing surprise attack are "primarily technical military problems." "Inspection for Disarmament" documents the shortcomings as well as the capabilities of push-button warning systems.

Book Reviews

Inspection for Disarmament. Seymour Melman, Ed. Columbia University Press, New York, 1958. 291 pp. $6.

Abraham Lincoln, voicing his conviction that bold ideas and new proposals must come from without the Government, once wrote that "the people will save their Government if the Government itself will do its part only indifferently well." A group of "outsiders" working under the aegis of Columbia University's Institute of War and Peace Studies has succeeded in a combined effort which would have pleased Lincoln mightily; they have come to grips with one of the thorniest and yet most compelling problems of the nuclear era—the task of inspecting for weapons should the nations of the world agree to disarm.

Writing in the foreword, William T. R. Fox states the problem and the hope in a single sentence: "New vistas for negotiation and agreement would be opened up by a technically well-founded judgment that it would be possible to install on this planet a disaster-proof alarm system to detect and identify a clandestine violator of a disarmament agreement." He makes it clear that the technique of arms control must be capable of ferreting out "militarily decisive amounts" of forbidden war materials. The double emphasis—militarily decisive and disaster-proof—strikes a note of realism that has been lacking in the language of the prophets of doom who insist on fool-proof or cheat-proof inspection.

The book, as organized by Seymour Melman, a dynamic industrial managerial expert at Columbia University, consists of three parts. There is a general report of some 50 pages which defines the problems of inspection and surveys the gist of the 18 individual reports which follow. Then there follow three brief reports of "evasion teams" which were assigned the task of finding loopholes in the inspection systems for disarmament.

I would suggest that the reader savor the full flavor of the 18 separate reports before tackling the general report. Some of the specific reports are so compressed that editor Melman faced an extremely difficult summarizing chore. That Melman succeeded in keeping his 18 authors from wandering away from the main topic is a notable achievement.

One of the most refreshing aspects of the book is that most of the contributors are newcomers to the disarmament field. This probably accounts for the attitude of enthusiasm and optimism which they adopt.

The Columbia group began its work early in 1957 with financial support from the Institute for International Order. They energized themselves with the incentive that a disarmament agreement "would help to preserve the human species and to prevent a world holocaust." However, they divorced themselves from the politics of such an agreement and fixed their attention upon a workable inspection system.

The over-all approach to this challenging problem is a bold one. There is a direct address to the central issue of general disarmament on a broad scale rather than to piece-by-piece, incremental arms limitation; this may be viewed by some as unrealistic, but the value of the study is that it is not watered down. Indeed, there are many today who feel both that the past decade of arms talks have failed because they have aimed too low and that a more radical approach might work.

Not all of the 18 expert opinions on inspection can be invoked in a brief review. However, one may summarize and consolidate their views. Aerial inspection is appraised as being useful for present-day delivery systems but "of almost no value once the intercontinental ballistic missile becomes part of the military arsenal." Not much hope is held for fiscal inspection since governments are experienced in concealing the use of funds from the public; a small percentage of a national budget can be kept from public scrutiny. In the United States a budget which is a significant fraction of $1 billion is concealed for intelligence purposes.

Jay Orear's analysis of the feasibility of detecting nuclear tests has already been published in the Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists and has been given in amplified form as testimony before the Humphrey committee investigating disarmament. If the Columbia study produced nothing more than the Orear paper it would have been well worth the effort, for this analysis demonstrated again that nonaccess to secret data is no real barrier to evaluation of nuclear issues.

Official secrecy serves to inhibit public discussion and undermines confidence in nonofficial studies. Moreover, secrecy can prevent outside experts from putting the right numbers into their analyses. For example, James H. Boyd (Columbia) assumes that the critical mass of fissionable material is about 90 pounds. But such miscues should not detract from the fundamental good aim and focus of the individual studies made by the Columbia group.

It is distinctly encouraging that the report is not monopolized by the atom. The valuable analyses of John B. Walsh (Columbia), Eugene A. Avallone (C.U.N.Y.), Henry Burlage (M.I.T.) and Charles J. Marsel (N.Y.U.) concern missiles, guidance systems, propulsion, and fuels. They emphasize the fact that numbers of nuclear weapons in stockpile are futile digits unless they can be delivered on target. Therefore delivery vehicles, especially missiles, become of surpassing importance in disarmament-inspection studies.

The multiple approach to inspection, accented throughout the book as highly significant, looks most promising in the case of inspection for missiles. For example, ferreting out the production of an Atlas type ICBM is no needle in a haystack dilemma; this is quite apparent from the fact that the needle is over 100 feet in length. An intercontinental missile is the product of a highly developed and specialized technology. Approximately 40,000 separate parts must be assembled for a single ICBM. Some of these components, such as gyroscopes and accelerometers, require ultraprecision manufacture. For example, only one firm in the United States was able to supply a machine precise enough for ultraprecision gear hobbing.

Very few military men would be willing to stockpile missiles without proof-testing a sufficient initial quantity of the birds to be sure of performance characteristics. Once proof-tested, the missiles would require periodic testing to assure their viability. With this in mind D. G. Brennah (M.I.T.) discusses the detection of high-altitude missile tests in an analysis which should be related to Orear's paper. Clearly, if monitoring posts are installed in the major countries of the world to detect nuclear tests, they ought to be instrumented to detect missiles as well. The spacing between stations is compatible with the twin detection of bombs and missiles.

Vincent Groupé (Rutgers) presents a very brief discussion of the inspection problem as related to biological warfare—or the "poor man's A-bomb." He avoids underlining any conclusion, but ing does not have to read between the lines to realize that, as far as inspection is concerned, the problem of biological warfare is vastly different from all others discussed in the book.

A fascinating insight into the production and smuggling of clandestine arms is provided by Lt. Col. Rivlin, an officer in the army of Israel and a man with 20 years' experience in covert operations. His cloak-and-dagger story is worthy of book-length expansion and might even achieve best-seller lists if he accentuated the humorous angles which developed when the Hagana set out to frustrate British control. The Hagana located a transportation center less than 100 yards from the British Headquarters in Tel Aviv; it smuggled illegal cargo by draping it with an overlayer of fresh fertilizer and in one case with rather ripe onions; over-all, it conducted an efficient underground operation with minimal interference.

Sociologist William M. Evan (Columbia) reports on public opinion polls, including some Gallup polls not published heretofore, on attitudes toward inspection and supranationalism. It is discouraging to find the United States lowest (West Germany and Japan are highest) on the list of countries favoring worldwide inspection. On the other hand, 97 percent of those queried from the membership of the Federation of American Scientists favored inspection (3 percent of the FAS must be given hearing tests!) as opposed to 53 percent of the American Legionnaires favoring inspection for disarmament. (No comment.)

Psychiatrist Alberta Szalita completes the team of 18 experts and provides some highly interesting insights into the psychological aspects of questions bearing on man's capability to live in peace. She asks: "Does man possess psychological equipment for disarmament as well as for evasion?" Commenting on governmental decisions, she states: "It is also plausible to assume that some, if not many, of the decisions are prompted by personal needs and the nature of the personality characteristics of some government representatives." This point is well taken, for when decisions are reached in secret the personality traits of the decision-makers may be decisive.

The reports of the three evasion teams are so terse as to discourage further compression. However, they emphasize that "The sooner a disarmament agreement could be achieved between the nations, the simpler the problem of inspection." They recognize that evasion is easier in a totalitarian country. They stress the fact that the Achilles heel of disarmament is the secreting of stores of arms prior to inspection. They note "how vast a distance still separates the world from genuine full disarmament."

This optimistic yet realistic appraisal of inspection for disarmament does not attempt to deal with political feasibility. Its obvious hope is that disarmament will reduce international tensions and that small steps will lead to big steps. This view will be challenged by those who feel that there can be no mechanical crutch for jumping into an era of reduced tension. Arms, they say, are the end products of fear and while more arms increase tension, less arms do not necessarily decrease it in the era of nuclear missiles.

The great merit of this pioneering book is that it penetrates to the core of the disarmament-inspection problem. Columbia University Press manufactured the book in an incredible five weeks in order to bring the book to the public on the heels of the Geneva talks. It is to be hoped that this good timing will give this book the kind of national readership which it so much deserves. It is without doubt the most significant book I have read this year.

Washington, D.C.

The Kingdom of Jordan. Raphael Patai. Princeton University Press, Princeton, N.J., 1958. ix + 315 pp. Illus. $5.

This volume is considerably more important and more widely useful than its simple title would suggest. The real worth of the book is not immediately apparent even in some of the earlier chapters, which, almost in Baedeker fashion, deal with physical environment and supply skeletal outlines of Jordan's history, its contemporary political and economic structure, and its attributes as a Middle Eastern state. Interspersed among these factual recitals, which presumably are intended to serve principally as a context for a detailed treatment of Jordanian society, are enlivening observations on the unifying influence of religion and language, on pan-Arabism, and on the relationship between power-prestige and cultural attitudes. These sociological excursions give advance notice of the fact that the essential contribution of the book, as might be expected from the author's previous writings, consists in a masterly analysis of the human components of Jordan—an analysis that holds good to an almost equal degree for the surrounding Arab countries.

Most of the topics with which the author is mainly concerned—the family, the nomads, villages and towns, religion, health, language, and education—have been discussed by other students of Arab life and Islamic institutions in recent years. Few, however, have shown the depth of perception and understanding of the characteristics peculiar to the several elements in the Jordanian population that are displayed here. Patai is nearly at his best in dealing at some length with the changes that have been taking place in nomadic life since World War I. One misses only an evaluation of two of the more potent of the causative factors: the high-power rifle and the motorcar.

The final chapter, on "Values and outlook," is an excellent synthesis of all that has gone before. It makes clear the problems and perplexities of groups at various cultural levels in a predominantly Muslim environment now in transition between customary and traditional values and the contrasting ones of an ever-encroaching modern world. Caught up in this process, the Arab has to form new concepts of freedom, independence, and leisure. In this connection, the author explains some of the manifestations—such as the irruption of street mobs which of late have seriously complicated political processes in Jordan and neighboring countries. Ascribing many of these phenomena to youths recently emancipated from the discipline of the family, he remarks: "They discover that they can support causes by participating in street demonstrations, that there is the freedom of the crowd, the independence gained through anonymity, the emotional satisfaction of mob action. This is a truly new experience. . . . Now they feel free to commit irresponsible acts in the name of patriotic fervor and indignation." Here, the author tacitly suggests, is raw material for government endeavor. The question of the book, he concludes, is: "Into what direction will these changes lead the nascent Jordanian nation?"

We subdivided the land and plan to sell large lots and then build there ourselves in a year or so to be ready to retire there when the time comes. We dug 2 gallons of butter clams in front of lot 2 Block 1 in 15 minutes. This region has 19 inches of ~~to~~ rainfall and 200 sunny days per year.

Dear Mr. Mewett:

I have had a rather disappointing experience in the matter of recordings of Mr. Murrow's wartime broadcasts from London retained by our Records Library. It seems that hardly anything of value has been kept. I am sending you a recording of ORCHESTRATED HELL dubbed at 7½ and a tape containing excerpts from some of Mr. Murrow's broadcasts, which are as follows: the first cut is one of his broadcasts in which he describes a Churchill speech, RAF daylight raids and the effects of Nazi raids. The second cut is of the air raid from the record. And the last cut is also out of the record.

I am also sending you certain scripts which might be useful.

Sincerely yours,

Dear Mrs. Meyer:

Thank you very much for your nice letter of June 6.

Your kind comments about my programs are indeed appreciated. It is always nice to know our viewers are pleased with the type of programs we produce.

I hope that when I do return to CBS, from my sabbatical it will be with a program worthy enough to warrant your continued attention.

Sincerely yours,

MRS. ELIZABETH T. MEIJER

Dear Mr. Murrow,

Time is getting short for us to hear your always welcome and informative broadcasts, so I think it is also time that I wish for you a most happy and gratifying year.

I am sure many people have told you how much we are all going to miss you and your sound explanations of worldaffairs and I shall be one of you. A friend is going out of my life temporarily (and only that thank goodness) to whom I have listened and from whom I have learned much almost daily for almost twenty years.

I am glad we shall hear your voice occasionally on some of your broadcasts. If by any chance you pay a visit to my native country Holland I hope you will salute it for me.

So I say "Bon Voyage" to you and your family! What a wonderful year for your boy!

And have a wonderful year till we hear you again I hope on your every day spot.

With my very best wishes,

Most gratefully yours

Dear Agnes:

I am terribly sorry to hear the news about Eugene. Please convey to him my warmest greetings.

Please don't give a moment's thought to the party for the Mount Kisco theatre group. No-one there except the producer knew of your gracious gesture, so there will be no problem about rumours circulating.

I shall be here until the beginning of July and, after that, on our farm which isn't too far from Mount Kisco, so we will see you and Eugene before we leave the country.

As ever yours,

Dear Ed:

This is sad news. Eugene in in the hospital and there is not the slightest chance that I shall get to Mount Kisco this June. Even if he can come home he will have to stay in Washington for the month so that he can remain under the doctor's observation.

This means that we can't have our party for the Mount Kisco Theater Group. If you can, please get out of it without mentioning the fact that Eugene is sick because it is sure to get round Mount Kisco in no time flat if local people know of it. Wouldn't it be all right to say that unforeseen emergencies prevent me from coming to Mount Kisco during June, and let it go at that?

Actually I do not know when we shall get there this year as we can't possibly move until Eugene is strong enough to make the trip.

With regret, and love to you and Janet,

Sincerely,

Agnes

Dear Ed:

As our party on June 30 for the Mount Kisco Theater Group is so late, why don't you and Janet plan to stay overnight? Even if you have to go to town early the next day it would be more comfortable than going in at night.

At present Eugene is in the hospital but I am hoping to get him to the Farm on schedule.

With affectionate greetings to Janet and to you,

Unhappily, Janet and I cannot join you on the weekend of the thirteenth and fourteenth. We are both sorry.

You are, as always, gracious and generous in agreeing to provide drinks for a few people after the opening performances at the Mount Kisco Playhouse. Janet and I will certainly be there and I shall be personally responsible that the theatre group shall not number more than thirty. Thank you again.

Dear Ed:

This is a new angle on Federal Aid to Education. I really think if we don't start improving our schools right away, we're going to lose the cold war and the Communists will win the world.

Do you think you could do anything about it in one of your broadcasts? I am really worried about the way things are going down here.

Plea for Federal Support for Education

Testimony before the General Education Subcommittee of the House Education and Labor Committee

April 28, 1958 10:00 a.m.

Gentlemen -- My name is Agnes E. Meyer -- I represent no organization -- I cannot come before you with the resounding statement that I speak for X million people of some powerful lobby -- But since the beginning of World War II I have probably visited more public schools in more parts of our country than any other non-professional. I have seen and suffered intensely from the evil effects upon our children when they go from poor, overcrowded homes to poor, overcrowded schools. I have also had the exhilarating experience of personal conversations with the resolute, brilliant youngsters whose minds and characters have blossomed under the influence of our finest public schools. That thousands upon thousands of our children should be denied an equal opportunity for self-development because they were born and grew up in impoverished areas of our country, has always seemed to me an unendurable injustice, yes a crime in a country as rich as ours. So if I represent any special group as I plead once more for Federal support to education I am making myself a spokesman for the multitude of American boys and girls whose lives have been blasted, and those whose future development is still being frustrated because neither our Federal Government, nor the American people as a whole are sufficiently aware that such cruelty is a commonplace in our great nation. Since we have many first-rate elementary and secondary schools in the prosperous sections of our country, it is obvious that we could have equally good schools everywhere if the less productive states and communities could afford them.

You will hear many technical experts who will give you exact figures to show the disparity that exists in our educational system, and what this costs our nation in loss of productive capacity. But I shall concern myself chiefly with the meaning of those facts to the security of our country. Therefore I wish to make a flat statement at the outset of my testimony on behalf of Federal support for education, namely, that there is nothing wrong with our public school system that money cannot cure.

Why is this true? It is true because adequate funds would make it possible to have small classes in well-equipped buildings. If we could pay our teachers a wage commensurate with their responsibilities, more and better educated men and women would enter the profession. Although the greater part of our school system is obsolete in this post-Sputnik era, our numerous schools where a modern curriculum exists and modern methods of education are practiced, could be used as models for the complete reorganization of our poorly endowed school systems. Despite all the criticism of our schools we have enough educational leadership in every state of this country to create a first-class public school system, if only the American people can be aroused to pay the price.

And pay the price we must -- for today the development of every ounce of talent we possess is not merely a matter of justice and equality of opportunity -- it is a life and death issue. All well-informed Americans know that we are losing the cold war for lack of trained personnel. Our inherent defence strength rests upon the quality of our manpower and brain power. Says Arthur R. von Hippel of Massachusetts Institute of Technology in the March issue of the Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists: "There is a desperate urgency in our present situation. Our adversary is politically much more cunning than we are, and his technical strength is surpassing ours at a rapid rate. Shortly, we may be confronted with an ultimatum to surrender or be annihilated. This is the challenge, and against it our response has to be measured".

Gentlemen, that is not the statement of an hysterical pessimist. It represents the coldly considered judgment of a distinguished scientist who knows the Russian potential and our own. He expresses it in a plea for better coordination of research work at the University level. But the quality of scientists and researchers in our colleges and universities depends upon their preparation in our elementary and secondary schools.

Why in the face of such dire warnings is there such indifference to this vital question of improving our educational system through Federal support? It is due to the fact that our people are unaware of the danger to which they are exposed. Consequently they do not understand the central importance of education to the survival of our country and the freedom of mankind.

This is psychologically understandable. Despite the open and often repeated threats of the communist leaders that their purpose is world domination, neither our political leaders nor the American people can comprehend that the freedom of our great, prosperous, and powerful nation could ever be seriously threatened. Protected in the past by two oceans our nation has heretofore been safe from all foreign invasion. We have no experience of tragedy. We have a history of progress and success which makes it difficult for us to adjust our thinking to the perils of the nuclear age. Therefore it is not surprising that anyone who says that the communists are out-manoeuvering us on every front and that we are in danger of imminent disaster, sounds like a Cassandra. Our minds are well aware, especially since the launching of the Sputnik, that we are losing our position of world leadership. But in our hearts we feel too secure and too certain of ultimate victory. As a result there is no sense of urgency to improve our chaotic society and to make our nation strong enough to cope with the manifold foreign and domestic problems that confront us. We think there will always be time to do next year what we fail to do now. As a result there is an indifference even in the Congress to Federal support for education. Unless we awaken from this dream world we shall regret it to the end of time.

It is only natural that our political leaders should give first priority to military defense and foreign policy. But in a thermonuclear age even military preparedness and the implementation of foreign affairs, depend upon the development of a vast reservoir of highly skilled manpower of many different kinds. We also need highly trained personnel that can guide our complex society here at home -- a society bound to become far more complex now that automation is already coming into use. Unskilled labor will become a drug on the market when complicated machines produce goods in a small fraction of the time and labor now required. Dr. Norbert Wiener of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology in his book on "Cybernetics" warns us: "Taking the Second Industrial Revolution as accomplished, the average human being of mediocre attainments or less, has nothing to sell that is worth anyone's money to buy". Obviously we must train the majority of our population for the higher skills needed in an automated system of production, or we shall have an unemployment situation which will make this depression and even that of the thirties look insignificant. So dangerous a situation might tempt our people to accept dictatorship in preference to social chaos.

Thus in the face of the rapidly expanding power and influence of the U.S.S.R., there is but one chance that we can hold our own whether in military defence, foreign affairs, or domestic social stability -- the power of education must be expanded at once to overcome the power of ignorance if our nation is to achieve genuine defense and the genuine security for which we yearn.

The U.S.S.R. still uses the threat of nuclear war but they will not resort to war because they are justified in believing that they can win their objective -- world domination -- without it. The cold war has been shifted by the crafty leaders of the Kremlin from a competiton in physical strength to a competition in brains. At this very moment the outcome of what has now become a hot war, is being fought in the classrooms of the U.S.S.R. and the U.S.A. We must heed the warning of Lloyd V. Berkner, member of the President's Scientific Advisory Council, in his article "Earth Satellites and Foreign Policy"; "The year 1957 may well stand in history as the point in time at which intellectual achievement forged ahead of weapons and national wealth as instruments of national policy. The achievement of the Soviet satellite" says Dr. Berkner "has demonstrated to Americans what they refused to believe before that they are in a race for intellectual leadership, when they hadn't realized that there was a race. In the complacency of our assumed technological lead, we have confused our high standards of living and material prosperity with intellectual stature. It is an extravagant and dangerous mistake" concludes Dr. Berkner.

Why do we find ourselves in this frightful predicament? Why do we have to acknowledge that the Russians have snatched from us the economic, intellectual and psychological leadership of the entire world? Largely because we have never examined the real reason why the U.S.S.R. has forged ahead so fast that it is now threatening our supremacy in productive capacity including the productivity of missiles. We never examined the real reason why the U.S.S.R. is such an astute and dangerous enemy -- We entertained the naive conviction that communist authoritarianism must crumble from within because nothing so hostile to our self-satisfied and self-righteous democracy could long endure.

Our fatuous pride was due to the fact that we overlooked the true reason for the ever-increasing power of the Russian communists -- their faith that cultivation of the human mind is the greatest single source of power.

While we have been neglecting our schools as never before, the Russians from the moment the Bolsheviks came to power in 1917, have devoted the same close attention to educating the young and old as they did to the development of their armed forces and the administration of their economy. They have always spent a higher percentage of their total income on education than we have. As a result in forty years they have transformed a semi-feudal, illiterate population into an advanced industrial nation whose productivity rivals our own and exceeds it in many respects. It is a wholly admirable, it is a fantastic achievement; no wonder the underprivileged nations throughout the world say to themselves: "If Russia did it, we can do it". As George S. Counts states at the end of his momentous book, "The Challenge of Soviet Education": "Education is one of the most fundamental realities of the Soviet system. The Bolshevik leaders from the first have regarded education with utter seriousness, far surpassing in this respect the leaders of any free society on the earth. They regard education as a "mighty weapon" in the cause of Communism. Without their vast system of educational agencies, the Bolsheviks would not be standing in the position of power they occupy today."

Let's face it. The Soviet leaders have always had a deeper insight into the relationship between national education and national power than we have. They had the foresight to implement this faith by creating a public educational system that reaches into every hamlet. Out of sheer necessity, the Russian political strategists have developed more foresight than ours and the Russian people work harder than ours. Recently while speaking to our American observers of the Russian elections, Khrushchev predicted (according to the New York Times, March 19) that in the future the United States will always lag behind the Soviet Union in scientific achievements. He said this would be so not because Americans were less talented than Russians but because only in the Soviet Union did all young men and women have the opportunity to develop their talents. And on April 11th he said communism would win the struggle with us not by war but by raising labor productivity, increasing the output of goods and building up its economy. To all of these warnings -- which are no idle boasts -- we Americans remain indifferent. I fear this is due to the fact that we take Russian education no more seriously than we take our own. Yet we must face this educational challenge realistically or we shall soon find ourselves in the position of a second rate world power.

Gentlemen, this is what the Congress and the American people must realize, that we have to build a new strength into our nation -- and the greatest source of strength is education. In this scientific era knowledge is power as never before.

This was emphasized in the 1958 Parliament of Science conducted by the American Association for the Advancement of Science in the following paragraph:

"The urgent need to develop fully the intellectual resources of our nation requires a prompt and thorough recognition of the basic importance of education in our society. Our schools and colleges will be able to contribute fully to the solution of the problems that now confront us only if the improvement of the teaching profession is accorded a high priority among our major concerns. We must compensate teachers at levels which reflect the degree to which the destiny of the nation depends on teaching of the highest quality. Only through such a realistic approach can we hope to solve the quantitative and qualitative shortages which now seriously limit what schools and colleges are able to accomplish."

I realize full well that we cannot waste our national substance. I am as conscious as any other taxpayer that expenditures for armaments will increase to astronomical figures. But the nation's peril is such that our people must stop wasting their substance on more and more gadgets and luxuries. We must accept a new primacy of values with education as our highest goal.

We must be willing to make sacrifices for education now lest we be obliged to make heavier sacrifices later. Let me use the armaments program as an example. Why are we suddenly obliged to multiply our appropriations for bigger and deadlier missiles? Because policy under this administration has been made by the Bureau of the Budget. Even our military security, until Sputnik woke us up, was sacrificed to a balanced budget. As a result we must now accelerate our plans for military offence and defence at a far heavier cost, for it is always true that haste makes waste. The same need for a costly crash program in the educational field will arise in the future unless we begin at once to appropriate adequate sums for the year by year improvement of education. Of course the Bureau of the Budget will argue all the more strenuously that we spend nothing on education since we have now been forced to spend such gigantic sums on missiles and satellites. Gentlemen, the control of the purse and thus the making of national policy belongs to the legislative branch of our Government. I hope that you will make it clear to the executives who have allowed the Bureau of the Budget to usurp these powers, that you the legislators put the safety of our country above monetary considerations, and that in this national crisis we must move quickly to improve the quality and quantity of our education throughout the country. Even if such a decision on your part would involve higher taxes, I am convinced the American people would be willing to pay them if they know how perilous the world is in which they live and must continue to live.

Therefore I call upon you to support primarily HR 10763 and in a modified form HR 10381. Moreover we should not think of these bills as Federal Aid -- as if it were a form of charity. The Federal Government has long recognized its responsibility to share with the states and the localities the responsibility for the education of our children. Now that share must be increased.

Gentlemen, the only bill before you that meets the need for school construction and for increasing teachers' salaries -- the two most crucial problems of our public school system -- is the one introduced by Mr. Metcalf in the House and Senator Murray in the Senate. Other witnesses will describe in detail the shortage of trained teachers and the shocking conditions of class-room overcrowding, often in obsolete buildings, that have grown more acute every year in many sections of our country. As background for my argument, I shall merely state that despite all the efforts made by the states and localities approximately two million 300 thousand children are in excess of present school capacity. We have a shortage now of some 142 thousand class-rooms. This means that not only these 2.3 million children receive an inadequate education, it means that they overcrowd the existing school-rooms and lower the educational standards of millions of other children. At the same time, due to the high birth-rate we must provide additional class-rooms for one million more children every year. Despite the extraordinary efforts of the States to keep abreast of their school construction needs, the limited financial resources in many old established communities and the new suburban towns are not sufficient to eliminate the class-room bottle-neck.

At the same time there is a critical teacher shortage due largely to the pitiful salaries they receive in many of our states.

HR 10763 provides one billion dollars in the fiscal year 1959 and raises this yearly to four or five billions which the states would be empowered to use either for school construction or for the increase of teachers' salaries or both, depending on the primacy of their needs. This appropriation added to the continuing efforts of the states and localities would enable them gradually to overcome their most acute difficulties. If the grants to the States for construction are made quickly enough, the program would create greatly needed employment. I cannot help criticizing the administration and the Congress for a public works program that calls for highways, housing and post-offices but no schools. For every new highway would create new communities and every new community needs schools, for which the funds would be lacking.

But an emergency program for school construction must not be allowed to take the place of a long-range program. For we can catch up with our educational problems only if we work at their solution year by year for at least five years to come.

The increase of teachers' salaries must inevitably accompany any program to build more schools if we are to attract young men and women in greater numbers, of the quality now needed to improve our educational standards. The nation since Sputnik is particularly concerned with the shortage of science and mathematics teachers. I have preached for years that this shortage could never be overcome unless salaries were raised. Every year for years we graduated several thousand science teachers only to have most of them absorbed by industries that can afford to pay them a living wage. It is futile to think we can counteract this trend until teaching salaries are commensurate with those offered in the business world.

At the same time I am opposed to raising the salaries of mathematics and science teachers while ignoring other salary scales as is proposed by the Administration bills. Such a procedure would undoubtedly create difficult problems of administration and destroy teaching morale in every school in the country. Furthermore we need scientists who know history, languages and the social structure of which they are an integral and influential part.

The 1958 Parliament of Science, conducted under the American Association for the Advancement of Science, stated explicitly: "Both public policy and the welfare of science require an educational system that is strong at all levels and in all fields of knowledge. Efforts to advance science at the expense of other fields of learning would harm all fields of learning and the society they serve".

We hear constantly that Soviet curriculum is overweighted with scientific studies and that this is the secret of Russia's technological, economic, and political progress. Gentlemen, this is not true. In the Russian ten-year middle school, attended by approximately thirty million pupils from seven to seventeen years of age, the curriculum is not only rigorous but carefully balanced. As both Russian parents are usually working people, Khruschchev is now rapidly developing public boarding schools, already attended by 75,000 boys and girls, which, as he put it, would complete for its students "the transition from the lower stage of communism to its higher stage" and "bring up the builders of a new society, individuals of great spirit and lofty ideals, wholeheartedly serving their people who are marching in the vanguard of all mankind". To be sure the Russians emphasize science but against a background of history, literature, languages and geography. They are "marching in the vanguard of all mankind" and capturing world leadership because they never send economic or technological advisors to foreign lands unless they can speak the language plus the native dialects, understand the agricultural and economic needs of the people whom they are supposed to advise and understand enough about their psychology and customs to win their sympathy.

Now, gentlemen, I am not pointing out how well adjusted the Soviet education is to communist purposes of world domination with the idea that we should copy their curriculum. The essence of the challenge of Soviet education is this: We must strive to develop an educational system and philosophy which will serve the purposes of a free society as effectively and imaginatively as the Soviet education serves the purposes of despotism.

In the main this philosophy consists of giving each child the education best suited to his individual capacities. The localities must now realize that public education has a responsibility to the nation. The Federal Government, on the other hand, must also realize that the diversity of American education must be preserved. Furthermore, the time has come when our Federal Government must not only support public education but cooperate closely with the Federal and State Departments of Education on certain educational needs of various government agencies. We could make no greater mistake than to introduce the authoritarian guidance of the Soviets; but there is no reason why our expert school councillors should not point how and where our most gifted students could best use their talents to serve the nation. For example, if we are going to develop teachers and technologists who can speak French, German, Italian, Japanese or Chinese, Russian, Hindi, or whatnot, we shall never produce enough unless they are given prospects of a career in which such knowledge can be applied. Henceforth we must regard education not only as the path to self-development and an enlightened citizenry, but as an indispensable means for building a strong nation capable of the world leadership that has been thrust upon us.

That is why a scholarship program such as that proposed in HR 10381 is essential. It provides for 40,000 scholarships awarded by the State Educational Commissions; and during each of the five succeeding years it authorizes 40,000 additional scholarships every year.
Mr. Elliott's term, "National Defence Scholarships" is well chosen. But they should not be confined, as is set forth in other bills, to scientific studies. Our need for trained personnel is so acute and so varied, that the recipients of these scholarships should be chosen on merit, and merit includes character and diversity of talent as well as intellectual achievement. We cannot afford to be sentimental about allowance for so-called environmentally handicapped students. We have more than enough able boys and girls who do not go to college for financial reasons. The Educational Testing Service reports that last year 150,000 of our top-grade high school graduates did not go to college for lack of funds. We must reserve these scholarships for those highly qualified students. We cannot afford any other policy.

Persons awarded scholarships under HR 10381 are paid $1000 per year which is less than the average tuition fee at the leading private universities. The actual cost to these universities per student is between $2500 and $3000. If the Federal Government wishes to help the private universities as well as the student, the scholarships should be increased if the recipient is accepted by one of these institutions. There is nothing new in this proposal. In the G.I. Bill for scholarships after World War II a cost of instruction allowance was included.

As these scholarships grow in number from year to year, I have no doubt they will have a galvanizing effect on the ambitions of our public school students not only in the secondary but even in the elementary grades. If one criticism of our public schools is justified it is that our children are not encouraged to work hard. Partly this is due to the false theory that every child should be promoted regardless of achievement. Partly it is due to the fact that many school curricula are obsolete and do not grip the children's attention. Hard work is the result of intense interest and interest cannot be aroused when the teachers have so many students that their energies are sapped by the problem of discipline. Furthermore, the overcrowding of our class-rooms makes it impossible to separate the bright and the subnormal children. This egalitarianism we can no longer afford. It is just as discouraging for the children with low IQ's as it is for those with high IQ's. We must now institute the several track system which permit children to progress according to their abilities. There is nothing undemocratic about this since the children in the lower groups get more individual attention especially in remedial reading and move to the next higher group as soon as they are ready for promotion. It is indeed the most democratic way of educating our children since it gives each child equality of opportunity, and the individual attention it needs.

Such a graded system is all the more necessary now that we must absorb in our white schools thousands of Negro children whose education has been neglected and therefore lag two or three years behind the white children in scholastic achievement. Without a system of homogeneous grouping according to individual abilities, the assimilation of a large proportion of Negro students would retard the education of the white children. We can overcome this difficulty and improve the education of both races, if the states and communities have enough money to accelerate the education of the Negro children and make a success of integration. To do this we must have not only smaller classes and more young teachers of great ability, but better school equipment, health programs, and other auxiliary services, psychiatric consultants and guidance experts aware of the stresses and strains to which the Negro children, their parents and the teachers themselves are exposed, especially during the period of transition.

Gentlemen, we cannot fail to make a success of school integration, if only because we need the talents of our Negro fellow-citizens. Therefore the Powell Amendment is a great disservice to Mr. Powell's fellow Negroes. To maintain that no State or locality which has not already integrated its schools should have Federal Aid, is short-sighted. For the South has a more acute lack of class-rooms than any other section of our country. And you can't desegregate schools you haven't got. As for the areas where desegregation has been achieved, if we do not show the South that with effort, intelligence, and ample financial resources, integration can be a success, we shall strengthen the revolt of Southern reactionaries against the law of the land, and destroy the unity of our country here at home and its prestige abroad.

Gentlemen, I have brought up many aspects of our educational problems; I have done it because it is impossible to understand the need for Federal support of education to our states and communities unless we see and feel the complexity of the problems and the need to solve them.

If the American people recognize that the very future of our country will be won or lost in our public class-rooms, they will surely be willing to pay the price for the nation's survival and growth. A new world civilization is in the making in this era of rapid evolution. The question is: Who will determine its character, the free nations or the Communists? I fear our people still entertain the naive conviction that history is on our side and that Western Democracy will always prevail in its battle against authoritarianism. What is more, we actually persuaded the other free peoples to believe in us and our boastful attitude. Yet at this very moment we face a turning of the tide when more and more of the uncommitted peoples are beginning to think that democracy is decadent and that communism represents the future need of mankind.

To regain the prestige we used to enjoy in foreign lands we must prove that democracy has a greater vitality than communism, the vitality of a free people determined to preserve their freedom. I ask you to imagine what an electrifying influence it would be throughout the world, when it becomes known that our great country -- the first to undertake the revolutionary idea of educating all its citizens -- had lived up to this faith and begun a new era of giving every child an equal opportunity for self-development.

That our people are becoming gradually aware of the need to improve our educational system, cost what it may, is indicated by a recent poll taken in New Jersey. The vote of adult citizens was 64% that Congress should help the states with Federal support of their schools. If you took a similar poll among your constituents, I am sure you would get a similar result. The people are not vocal enough because the average citizen is confused by the multiplicity of claims on the Federal Treasury. But what are Congressional leaders for if not to make articulate the priorities of need in their electoral districts? It is habitual in American thinking that the States should support the public schools. But quite apart from the fact that most of our states are financially over-extended in their attempts to keep up with the pressing need for more and better schools, we simply cannot wait upon the slow tempo of progress if this question is left to the states and localities.

This slow tempo is not due to failure of the people to realize the urgency of the problem. Many states and localities are anxious to do what they know should be done; they do not lack the will; they lack the financial resources. With the deepest sincerity and solemnity I wish to say this. Our nation is poised on a water-shed. The way we turn now may mean salvation or destruction of freedom for us and for mankind. What happens to American public education will determine what happens to America. And what happens to America will determine the course of history for generations to come.

Dear Agnes:

Again, I must abuse your patience by saying that I still don't know when or if I can get away from this miserable city. Janet and I are doing everything we can to try to co-ordinate a plan of some kind.

About Petr Zenkl - he is a noble and, in some ways, pitiable man. Lord Mayor of Prague before the war; spent nearly six years in concentration camps (I found him in Buchenwald); later Deputy Prime Minister under Benes; thrown in the clink by the Communists when they took over in Czechoslovakia; finally escaped; is, or at least was, recognized in Europe as an expert on both housing and health.

Much love and my best regards to Eugene.

As ever yours,

Dear Ed:

Herewith my latest effort to make the U. S. A. safe for democracy. The bare bones of the idea are outlined on page five. It appeals, I find, to trained minds who are wrestling with the same problem, namely, to make life more livable in our country by the use of modern methods and techniques. But I shall have difficulty selling it to the general public, including the Senators and Congressmen whom the general public elects to carry on its business.

I wish I had your gift for putting over complicated situations graphically and dramatically.

Enviously and affectionately yours,

SCIENCE AND DEMOCRATIC SOCIETY

Address before the 44th Annual Conference of the Michigan Welfare League, Detroit, Michigan
October 23, 1958, at 8:00 p.m.

AGNES E. MEYER

There is no group before which I would rather present the thoughts that I am about to submit to you. Although I am speaking before a State-wide Association, I should like to begin by paying my respects to the City of Detroit since it was my springboard for such social work as I have done in the adjacent cities and counties. I get indignant over the unfavorable publicity to which your great metropolis is subjected by journalists and other writers who are interested chiefly in sensational headlines and book titles. Actually there is no more civic-minded, progressive population anywhere in the country than the people of Detroit. No city has a finer, more community-minded institution of learning than Wayne University. For years I have had first hand knowledge of the fine co-operation between your city officials, labor and industry, and your public and private welfare organizations for the solution of state and local civic problems.

I was not surprised therefore that you chose so forward looking a topic for this State Conference as "Social Welfare Problems in the Space Age". It shows your awareness that in this era of rapid social transformation, our institutions, our social work methods and programs have not kept pace with altered human needs and the strains they create throughout the nation. Whereas formerly financial difficulties predominated as the cause of individual and family problems, now even those people without financial problems are harassed by serious mental and emotional breakdowns for which they need professional help. We have had many profound revolutions in our country in the past fifty years, in social, political and economic fields; but serious as these may be, the revolution in what may be called the psychological domain has been even more profound and alarming. The rapid upswing of our population, the increase in the number of children and old people, constant migration, the trek to the cities and back to the suburbs, the lack of proper educational facilities, poor housing, and lack of recreational outlets, above all the social disorganization created by the hot and cold wars, have piled up our problems to a point where the joint efforts of public and private welfare agencies can no longer deal effectively with the multitude of people who need help and guidance.

Nobody is more aware of this desperate situation than the social workers themselves. Many have a bad conscience about the situation knowing that skills which proved helpful to the individual can no longer cope with the sheer magnitude of new problems in a mass society. They feel as if they were "polishing brass while the ship is sinking" instead of devising totally new methods by which the ship of state can be kept going forward under full sail. Console yourself with the knowledge that your inadequacies are no more glaring than those in other major fields of human endeavor. Our whole social structure needs overhauling for neither in education, medical care, nor any of our other basic human needs have we been able to keep pace with the social transformation of the past fifty years. I believe that we are less in danger of destroying our civilization with an all-out atomic war than by our man-made social diseases and our present inability to deal with them effectively on a nation-wide scale. Incompetence, indifference, inertia, ignorance, and lack of foresight are more serious enemies of our society than communism, for they tempt Americans to lose confidence in themselves, in democracy and in the capacity of democracy to govern.

At the same time there is no nation in the world that is expending as much energy, money, and brain-power on the cause and cure of social evils than ours. The total amount of such research is staggering. It is actively carried on in Government agencies, in many universities and colleges, in graduate schools of social work, under the auspices of all the big and little Foundations, in every large industrial and business organization, by numerous national organizations, and by innumerable state and local groups. To be sure in comparison with research in the natural sciences it is a puny effort. But nevertheless there is much knowledge at our disposal as to what should be done to strengthen our social structure. Why is it not used effectively? The reasons are manifold, and I shall go into them later. But the chief reason is that we have not gathered and sifted existing data and never devised a scientifically planned approach to the moral, mental, and social health of our nation. Moreover, the will to translate knowledge into action would be stronger if there were national recognition of the important role of scientific social endeavor.

It is essential, therefore, that we should begin to experiment with a thorough study of the interrelated complex of our modern social problems. This calls for a scientific investigation of the common needs of mankind, a careful inventory of the resources available for satisfying them and a realistic appraisal of how our existing institutions contribute to or hamper the realization of fundamental human welfare. What, for example, do we know about the complex causes of the growing social menace -- youthful crime and delinquency? What do we know about the influence of a disorganized community on physical and mental health? What do we know about the methods and the proper goals of education in a scientific era? What guidance is given our people on the constructive use of leisure? What do we know about the psychological roots of race antagonism and the problems of desegregation? Why have we failed to eliminate poverty in our prosperous country? What do we know about the causes of dependency and methods by which dependent families can become self-sustaining? Why are we one of the last democratic nations to make health and medical services available to every citizen? Why do we allow slum areas to spread their disastrous influence in every city? What are we doing to anticipate the problems of old age? Why do we talk endlessly about the need for community reorganization without achieving it? Why do we bungle our relations with foreign peoples in spite of the many Government agencies that try to sell the American way of life abroad?

My friends, we could find answers for those questions; we could create a more humane society here at home and a world community based on international law, if we use scientific methods to analyze all available research which deals with the problems I have enumerated and many more. We need an agency to research research. In a nation whose very existence is threatened, this is now a moral imperative, for these objectives are no longer a utopian dream. They must be achieved not only out of self-interest but as the only sound approach to international understanding and good will. As Bertrand Russell has said, "Coexistence is the only alternative to non-existence."

Your conference subject "Social Welfare Problems in a Space Age" is well selected for the greatest lesson of the initial rivalry in launching satellites, lies in the formation of CASPAR, an international scientific body to coordinate research in outer space. But you and I are concerned with the problems of what may be just a minor planet, but very much our source of torment, anxiety, and responsibility. CASPAR will teach us about wind currents, about the weather, about almost everything except human beings. It is far more important to coordinate social research here on earth beginning with our own nation if only to preserve a jumping off place for the study of what may well be far happier, more peaceful planets than ours.

Let's face it. A great weakness - perhaps the greatest weakness - of democracy is its present inability to develop foresight and long-term planning, whether in domestic situations or foreign affairs. As a result we live from day to day and from crisis to crisis. This ineptitude was harmless in our early more static world. Now it has become extremely dangerous when science and technology can transform political, social, and economic conditions overnight. We cannot hope to achieve permanent stability in an evolutionary period such as ours; but we must establish stability within instability or permanence in change. This necessity, I maintain, calls for new concepts of government and new institutions by which they can be carried out.

Therefore, I have come here today to present the idea of a new agency under the Cabinet Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, an Academy of Scientific Humanism to act as a clearing house on a nation-wide basis through which the results of social research can be coordinated and made available for the planning of social action. The responsibilities of this Academy of Scientific Humanism or, if you prefer the title, Agency for the coordination of Scientific Research, would not be administrative. Its main functions would be four-fold:

1. It should collect research findings; distinguish between essential and inessential data; abstract them and make them available to all groups concerned with social research or social action.

2. It should interpret the meaning of these facts; in other words collate and synthesize them. It should research social research in such a way that its implications for action are clarified.

3. It should make recommendations for the conduct of new crucial research.

4. It should fill one of our greatest needs, long-term research on basic problems that would prove its worth only in years to come. This long term planning is something that existing private agencies cannot undertake because they have immediate acute problems to solve and because they cannot allocate annual sums of money for such research.

Let me answer at once the charge that such an Agency would prove too costly. We all know that stupendous sums of money could be saved by such an integration of social knowledge, for it would eliminate numerous research projects that waste money on trivial and futile endeavors and on the duplication of research that has already been done. Furthermore, this agency would save additional sums of money which are now spent in every community by the duplication of voluntary welfare programs and by a well-meaning but amateurish approach to what has become a highly technical and professional task. On the positive side we must weigh the benefits to our people and our country of a truly organic society in which people from youth to old age could lead productive, happy lives. It would give us the understanding and methods we now lack for effective intelligent leadership of the underdeveloped countries. It would have invaluable international repercussions if foreign nations realize that we have a separate agency for the application of scientific methods to create the humane society on a national and international scale. For the revolutionary ferment in Asia and Africa is created by the desire of these peoples to enjoy the same equality of opportunity that we still deny to many of our own citizens. This new Academy of Scientific Humanism would be the proof that our whole nation is so concerned about our major problems and theirs that we have brought together the best minds of our country to solve them. In other words the value of this agency cannot be measured merely by the wasted money it would save, but by the positive contributions it would make to the establishment of a new world civilization.

I am suggesting that this new agency be placed in the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare so that it could cooperate closely with the United States Public Health Service, the Social Security Administration, and the Department of Education. It could also act as scientific advisor to the Secretary whose influence would be enhanced if he could confront the Bureau of the Budget and the Congress with convincing data on the nation's needs.

I fully realize that such an agency, if it is under a Cabinet office, might be subject to severe political pressures. For the social sciences are concerned with some of the most controversial areas of the national scene. Ideally, a social science institute should be established on the pattern of the Academy of Sciences, with an endowment that would possibly exempt it from annual Congressional review and demands. But this Academy of Scientific Humanism must be established at once. We have no time to lose if our nation is to meet the challenge of communist ideas in the same area. Securing private funds would take far more time than drawing up and passing proper legislation through Congress. I believe that this agency could enlist the respect of the most prejudiced politicians, if the major Foundations, universities, the new International Council of Scientific Unions, and the important national bureaus of social science research were all represented in its membership, as well as the natural and biological sciences.

Political acceptance would also depend upon the status, character, and training of the Chairman. Doubtless we can find a sociologist of Lloyd V. Berkner's genius for scientific leadership. If not, it might be well to select an outstanding business man who is familiar with the application in the management field of operations-research and the principles of systems-engineering. Many of our industrial and business leaders are the most keenly aware that rapid advances in science and technology are shaping not only our personal lives and our social structure but also our industrial progress and national destiny.

To save time this Academy of Scientific Humanism should be equipped with computers and data processing machines such as none of the existing private agencies can afford. Then the energies of the Chairman and the board members could be concentrated on the interpretation, analysis, and synthesis of what the readings on the electric instrument panels really mean.

A clear need which this Academy could meet is the development of systematic sociological theory and the definition of methodology as a springboard to progress in the social sciences. The reason the physical and biological sciences are so far ahead of the sociologists in practical application is because they are more advanced in theories based on previous experimentation. Cancer research, to take an example, can proceed rapidly to test hypotheses based on well-substantiated theories; but mental health research is still groping among a wide range of tenuous theories relating psychic phenomena to interpersonal relations. The social scientists are still at the stage of the primitive Chinese metallurgist who knew that the mixture of copper and tin produces bronze, but, not knowing why, could not apply his knowledge to other combinations.

American sociology is also weak in the synthesis and interpretation of facts. We have, to be sure, numerous outstanding members of the profession. But specialization has narrowed sociological research and consequently the over-all vision of contemporary sociology. We are strong in such categories as sampling, polling, and other forms of specialized thinking. But Europeans such as Durckheim, Max Weber, Freud, Pareto, Croce, whether we agree with them or not, are bolder, more imaginative, more creative. As a result, especially in the case of Freud and Max Weber, they have fertilized the thinking of our leading sociologists. To be sure these great Europeans have few worthy descendants. As an exception to this rule I should like to call your attention to a sociological treatise recently published in America that gives us a penetrating insight into the economic degradation and the social decay of a whole nation. It is Germaine Tillion's study of Algeria, (Alfred A. Knopf). This French political scientist, social scientist, ethnologist, and psychologist represents in herself what is only a trend in American sociology, that of interdisciplinary research. Mlle. Tillion has a genius for making facts meaningful that our sociologists would do well to study. "Algeria" should also be read by every American government official who is dealing with pre-literate peoples in underdeveloped countries. It would save them the egregious mistakes they are now making through lack of empathy, psychological insight and scientific training. She points out how we are breaking down the ancient way of life of the unadapted nations without providing a vital substitute. The control of intergroup and international tensions is, in fact, one of our chief fields of ignorance. But I am confident that our own sociologists could rise to the same height of perception, if the Academy of Scientific Humanism lead the way, and developed patterns of action for the survival of western civilization and of human freedom the world over.

Then our politicians could not but listen with respect to the advice of our professional scientific experts. For our social scientists whether they are members of the Academy of Scientific Humanism or not, would work more fearlessly on domestic and foreign problems if they had the protection from political attack which a national Academy of Scientific Humanism would afford them.

At present both in national and international affairs all major political decisions involve technology and scientific knowledge. Yet most such decisions are made in a shockingly haphazard fashion. Even when the politicians call in a few scientific experts, they are often too ignorant, too indifferent, and too opinionated to take their advice if it doesn't suit their own objectives. For most of our political leaders, educated in a pre-scientific atmosphere, are unaware that they cannot cope with the complex problems of the day without scientific data and guidance.

I see no way of bridging the gap which exists in our society today between what we know and what we do, unless we establish at once this clearing house for social research. The natural scientists have long recognized that interdisciplinary cooperation is essential. The setting up of a Special Commission on Space Research, which I have already mentioned, is one recent example. The function of this body is to coordinate investigations in space by all nations. The National Academy of Sciences and the National Science Foundation have performed distinguished service in encouraging and coordinating the projects of the physical sciences. Both have divisions devoted to the social sciences, but the major interests of these two bodies lie properly elsewhere. An agency whose entire focus lies in the application of social research is equally vital to the welfare of our nation and its relation to all other nations.

Actually this is not as new an idea as it may sound to you. For several years leading national social science agencies and organizations of social workers have advocated social science advisory boards, departments for the co-ordination of psychological intelligence, for the study of foreign peoples and other methods of placing the scientific approach to national planning and foreign policy at the disposal of elected officials. They had no success. The climate of public opinion was not favorable to the extended use of the scientific analytical method to determine social and political policy. Surely you have not forgotten the attacks of the neo-theologians, neo-conservatives, and fanatical humanists on science and reason as the cause of all our woes and upon the very concept of social progress as a 19th century illusion. The neo-conservative position is nothing but a surrender before the difficulties of modern life. Fortunately the Russian sputniks have silenced the reactionary philosophers who succeeded for years in checking the use and progress of science.

Let us bear in mind that all a priori philosophy has always been superseded by other philosophies. But the rise of science has been a steady growth on the work of its predecessors during the past three hundred years. The rise of science, especially during the past fifty years, has been the most important single influence on human history. The historians now recognize this and some scientists declare that nobody should attempt to write history who is not scientifically educated. Let me give you one illustration of scientific myopia among the humanistic school of historians. Liebig's invention of artificial fertilization of the soil made possible the increase of European population and of workers for the new industries. Yet the historians of the period scarcely mention it. Just so at present there are daily scientific discoveries to whose influence on human affairs we must become more alert. Thus science and its methodology afford us a more stable foundation on which to build the future of a humane society than philosophy or history. It is, in fact, the only field in which there is an ever increasing vitality to which the greatest minds of the day are making contributions. Science in its broadest aspects has become the humanism of today.

Another factor with which we must reckon in trying to achieve an Academy of Scientific Humanism is the hostility of some political and social scientists to the natural sciences. This is a reflection of the artificial split between humanism and science which we inherit from the past. At a recent meeting of the International Political Science Association its president warned the membership that scientists are "politically naive" -- that only political scientists "understand influence, power, control and authority." This abstract metaphysical approach to understanding human behavior is a real barrier to progress at a time when only a realistic analysis of real problems can save us from further social disintegration.

Recent experiences in the international arena contradict the condemnation of scientists as naive. Despite the political overtones of the fall-out dispute, the international meeting of scientists at Geneva, including Russians and Americans, issued last August a unanimous report that fall-out is a hazard to the health of humanity. In the same month scientists from East and West, meeting in Geneva, agreed on the nature of a detection system needed to enforce a ban on nuclear tests. Surely these practical approaches to peace and coexistence are more significant results than those of all the political summit meetings put together. The results of the International Geophysical Year is one of the most promising examples that we need science as a guide to international understanding. As these scientists spoke the only common language of modern man, they succeeded in negotiating from a common ground of scientific concepts, as opposed to political representatives whose languages and concepts are so divergent that mutual understanding and agreements are virtually impossible. Perhaps what we need to advance international social planning, is a Socio-Physical Year in which leading sociologists, anthropologists, biologists, psychologists, as well as natural scientists would take part.

To end this discussion I shall quote Eugene Rabinowitch, Editor of the Bulletin of Atomic Scientists, a magazine which indicates the deep responsibility the leading atomic scientists feel for their social responsibilities. In the last issue of the Humanist Magazine he says: "Even in the field of politics scientists are not as naive as they are often supposed to be. When many of them propose radical solutions for the problems of our time, it is not because they are unfamiliar with the real state of affairs in the world and do not appreciate the difficulties of overcoming the traditional, ingrained prejudices and irrational passions which largely determine the behavior of men and nations, and of applying rational methods to the solution of human problems. They are well aware of all these obstacles; but they are even more acutely aware of the consequences of not trying to overcome them -- a necessity which many non-scientists simply refuse to face".

Fortunately several American politicians are equally aware that they must become scientifically literate. Congressman Peter Frelinghuysen had this to say after participation in the Geneva Conference on the Peaceful Uses of Atomic Energy, in a letter to the New York Times on September 28: "Perhaps, as some argue, scientists today are naive, and should not become involved in foreign and military policy. I could not help feeling, however, at Geneva that our young scientific spokesmen were presenting America's case most ably. Indeed it was impossible not to feel that those of us with political responsibilities might learn from them. There is a search for facts and a freshness and enthusiasm in the scientific field which, if transferred to politics, might result in political 'breakthroughs' comparable to today's scientific advances".

The spirit of science has this great advantage. It can be used effectively not only in politics but in all fields of human endeavor. It should encourage every branch of social science to become as tough-minded as the natural scientists who have learned to speak frankly and to advance unpopular truths when they deem it necessary.

Thus, we have no time to lose in organizing the Academy of Scientific Humanism. We must urge our Senators and Congressmen to draw up the necessary legislation before the next Congress meets. For inaction in a time of revolutionary change causes evils to multiply at compound interest.

We live in an artificial environment, the city. We wear chemically made clothing, travel on synthetic rubber tires, live in pre-fabricated houses and eat food whose production no longer wholly depends upon nature. Having created this artificial world, we must either make it over nearer to the heart's desire, or learn to live in it. We must discover whence we came, where we are now, and where we are going. Our old world is broken up. We must put the fragments together again. We shall never achieve an ideal humanity but we must nevertheless work as if it were possible to help every human being live out his life to the last moment in reverence, love and creative activity. We must hold before the world a vision of the human or democratic community as against the inhuman, collective society of communism. As the first step toward the fulfillment of this objective we must re-establish the cohesion of society as an organic whole in which man will again feel his relationship to his fellow men. This is of central importance: we must rescue the individual from the anonymity that threatens to engulf him in this artificial mass society of ours.

You know how long we have talked about the need for community reorganization without achieving anything except a few desultory experiments here and there. We need new scientific methods and new scientific leadership to find the solution. But we cannot expect results from an Academy of Scientific Humanism overnight. It will take time to gather together the great amount of research data now available and to process its meaning. In the meantime our public and private social organizations must carry on with a closely knit program for community welfare. Do not be discouraged. We have made the world in which we live. We can remake it if we recognize the place of science in the canons of human conduct and human relations and realize how greatly scientific method has augmented our power to influence human destiny.

Let us bear in mind that science and democracy are both forward looking, both experimental, both committed to such fundamental values as truth, honesty, justice, cooperation, and mutual forbearance. The ability, with the help of scientific cooperation in social, economic, and political fields, to form a truly humane society lies within our hands if we now recapture the abstract ideals of our Constitution -- the pursuit of liberty, equality, justice and happiness -- on a basis of reality. Therefore we children of the world's greatest democracy must think in this nuclear age, to use Tom Paine's expression, "as though we were the first men who ever thought". The reactionary forces are powerful in our country today. It is they who have brought social progress almost to a standstill. But there is no function left for the opponents of progress at a period when the strengthening of our society and that of all free nations is the only real defense against the spread of communism.

In concluding my arguments for a department of Scientific Humanism let me add a word of caution to protect myself from accusations of utopianism. The neo-conservatives claim that we starry-eyed liberals expect too much of science because we fail to realize that man's innate depravity makes progress an illusion. No scientist, whether in the natural or the social fields, would claim that intelligence, reason, and the scientific approach to problems will ever wholly dominate the course of history. The elements of chance, the unforeseen events, the pressures, rivalries, and passions -- the irrational strivings of individual and group life -- can never be completely eliminated from human activities. Thus human wisdom and knowledge intelligently coordinated and applied, will not necessarily save us from destruction and ruin. But if these tools are not sufficient, they are at least the essential conditions of human survival and social progress. Intelligence as critical scientific method applied to belief and conduct is the only reliable tool we possess for the choice of alternatives and therefore the reasonable object of our deepest faith and loyalty -- the stay and support of man's highest hopes.

The central theme of history is man's struggle for freedom. Only when men are free can they develop their capacities to the utmost. We need new instruments and new methods to preserve freedom even in this supposedly free country of ours. I am convinced that an Academy for Scientific Humanism is one institution that could help us devise modern methods to continue the eternal search for the freedom of mankind.

Dear Ed:

Look would like to include you in its series, Look Visits and have assigned me to do the project, if you agree.

I'm enclosing tear sheets of the others in the series..Carl Sandburg, Ernest Hemingway, Pablo Casals, Frank Lloyd Wright, J. Robert Oppenheimer, Bertrand Russell, Leonard Bernstein, Alexander Calder.

They would like it to run this summer. I rather think it would be easier for you, and better pictorially, if we took pictures at your farm. I think we could do the whole thing in one not too long day, and we would want Janet there and, if you don't mind, Casey. My personal problem is that I'm going to be away from April 11 through April 26, three week-ends, so if you can arrange it, we would like to take the pictures before that, Saturday or Sunday or, if it is more convenient, any weekday.

I hope you like the idea, for I think it will be great fun. Maybe we won't be poetic but I think it can be very provocative. I will call your secretary on Monday afternoon to find out if you are free to talk about it.

Sincerely,

Isabella

Dear Ed:

Dan says to thank you for your invitation. He doesn't want to be around when I am working on Saturday both for my peace of mind and his, but he would be delighted to come up around six o'clock and take us all to dinner. He doesn't want Janet fussing around a stove after having photographers in the house all day..and we will go back that night, as he has to be in New York on Sunday.

I'll call your secretary for directions for us both (we'll be driving) next week. I've also asked Kay Campbell to try to remember some of your bright sayings. We plan to arrive at your place about 10:30 a.m. on Saturday, May 30, the photographer and I. If that isn't convenient, would you let me know? I'm going to be out of town from May 24 until May 29, but Dan will be happy to act as my secretary and take messages.

Yours,

Isabella

For directions turn over—

Dear Ed:

I am doing a piece on Lady Churchill for the Reader's Digest and I would appreciate it very much if you'd let R.D. buy you a drink sometime and let me talk to you briefly. When I was doing the story on you for McCall's, I asked you the person you most admired in England and I think you said Lady C.

I'll use your name or not, just as you prefer, but the Digest research from London is so stuffy I need a breath of fresh air.

I'll call your secretary a fter New Year's. Incidentally, thank you very much for a fine session Sunday night, Dan and I both enjoyed it very much.

Dear Ed:

Before Tom passed away we had a small informal gathering of the Knights of the Green Table, of course we had to show the film I took of our trip on the Rogue. Tom suggested he would like to send the film to you, thought you and Casey would enjoy seeing it.

According to the papers you are planning on taking a leave of absence and do some extensive traveling, before you go would you be kind enough to return the film to me.

Ed. knowing of the close relationship between you and Tom, I plan to have a reprint made of the film and give it to Mrs. Stoddard, I think she would appreciate it.

Give my regards to Casey.

Mr. Edward R. Murrow,

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Unconditional renunciation of its right to wage war would be the surest way our Government could change mankind's direction from suicide to survival. Since our political and economic leaders scorn such sensible action, let them involve themselves and their communist counterparts, alone, in any violence they may deem necessary. Then, their barbarism, though deplorable, would at least be appropriate. Why, however, should several hundred million people, completely innocent of instigating "incidents" over Berlin or any other issue, seek mutual extermination?

Archaic misconceptions, typical of those held by retarded juveniles or by paranoid sadistic perverts, motivate our military minded policy makers. Thus, they believe our readiness to kill is the measure of our Nation's greatness,-- indeed the prime purpose of its existance. They equate citizenship with gang membership wherein the mandate to murder is inescapable. Were these premises of theirs valid, we'd be better off under anarchy.

Further, they regard our armed forces as police establishments, ignoring the fact that, in fighting crime, police do not compel their families, friends, and neighbors to destroy the families, friends, and neighbors of criminals; nor, does mortal combat occur between law enforcement agencies of different countries.

Driven by a bestial compulsion surging behind their false facade of feigned concern for freedom, they cannot help but be protagonists for perpetuating the institution of war. Their pathological preoccupation with trying to achieve unchallengeable weapons supremacy proves this. It matters nothing to them that every death dealing device developed here merely inspires duplication elsewhere.

Plainly, we dare not entrust the search for peace to anyone who ever considers war a proper or rational course to pursue. Therefore, only persons like Nobel Prize winning humanitarian, Clarence Pickett, and scientist, Linus Pauling, should represent us in international negotiations.

Most important, we must repudiate our trigger-happy psychopaths of press and politics, rather than remain expendable pawns in their bloody global chess games.

For want of a warless world, liberty, justice, civilization,-- even life itself,-- may soon become meaningless. Must our Strategic Air Command, and Russia's, render the earth a mass of radio-active rubble, before we realize this, a searing second too late?

Sincerely yours,

Samuel Michaelson

Dear Sir:

During Mr. Murrow's T.V appearances I've taken notice of the excellent cut of his suits. Subsequently, I've learned that many of these suits are made in London.

Since, I too, have had clothes made in London, but with considerably less skill and success, I wonder if Mr. Murrow would be good enough to advise me, as to the name and address, of his tailor in London.

If Mr. Murrow would be so generous as to forward the above information to one of his ardent fans, I would be most appreciative

Dear Andre:

I am sorry that I was not available when you came in today. Needless to say, I am most regretful that it is impossible for me to accept the kind invitation of the Greek Government to join the group of newsmen visiting Greece between the 8th and 20th of October. But as you now know, I have certain commitments during that period which I cannot possibly cancel at this date.

We understand that the Queen of Greece is to visit this country in November and we would like very much to invite her Majesty to appear on our "Person to Person" program. If you think it at all possible that the Queen would be agreeable to the suggestion, may I ask John Aaron, one of my co-producers to telephone you to discuss the matter further?

With all good wishes.

Mr. Michalopoulos brought this letter in today. I explained to him why you could not take the trip - new show starting, prior commitments on Oct. 14 and 15 which you cannot cancel, etc. He said he had already told his people it was ridiculous to suppose you could undertake a trip at such short notice.

He also said that the Queen of Greece is coming here sometime in November for a visit of about six weeks (part to be spent on the Coast). Wants to know whether you would be interested in interviewing the Queen on radio or television, if she were willing.

GHANA

Milestone on Freedom's Road

This is the story of Ghana—once called the Gold Coast of West Africa.

Ghana—a new nation—developing modern skills and techniques without losing her African personality and culture.

Ghana—an independent member of the Commonwealth—setting for the African continent a pattern of freedom with dignity and peace.

Ghana—a vigorous nation—taking great strides in developing its natural and human resources.

Ghana—an exuberant country—as colorful as her traditional kente cloth—as melodic as her talking drums and smiling people.

From Empire to Colony...

The people of Ghana are believed to have migrated from the ancient empire of Ghana in the north more than 700 years ago.

Portuguese traders in 1471 were the first to discover her gold. Soon the coast was a chain of forts of traders from Portugal, Denmark, Sweden, Britain and Holland. The traders learned that the inhuman traffic in slaves was profitable and continued it for almost 200 years.

In 1844 Britain, which had gained control of the area, signed a Bond of mutual co-operation at Cape Coast with the coastal chiefs.

...to Independence

The movement for independence reached its peak after World War II under the leadership of Dr. Kwame Nkrumah. Arrested for his "Positive-Action" campaign, Dr. Nkrumah was overwhelmingly elected to the then Legislative Assembly in 1951 while still in prison. Summoned from prison by the British governor, he was asked to form the first government under the new constitution. In 1954 he formed the first all-African Cabinet.

Thus began the peaceful progress toward complete independence. The Assembly launched a Development Plan to improve the education, health and communications of the country. The British Crown recognized that the people were ready for self-government.

"My government in the United Kingdom has ceased from today to have any authority in Ghana," proclaimed the Queen of England through her representative, the Duchess of Kent, only six years later.

FREEDOM AND JUSTICE

Independence Day, March 6, 1957

At the stroke of midnight Ghana was born. As the solemn ceremonies within the National Assembly were concluded, the shouts of the crowds massed outside hailed the coming of independence.

The People Rejoice

For days the people in every region celebrated the coming of freedom. Fireworks, parades and dancing marked the event. Jubilation was contagious.

"We are proud that some of your distinguished leaders have been educated in the United States. We are also proud that many of our most accomplished citizens had their ancestry in your country. We are pleased that trade between our two countries has developed to the benefit of both countries. But most importantly, we revere in common with you the great and eternal principles which characterize the free democratic way of life."

—President Dwight D. Eisenhower

The World Sends Its Greetings

Official delegations from 72 countries were present. More than 200 journalists, broadcasters, photographers and television men covered the independence for the newspapers and airwaves of the world.

Two Days Later
Ghana Is Unanimously Elected
To the United Nations

Ghana Takes Her Place Among the Nations....

Three months after independence an African nation for the first time was represented at the Conference of Commonwealth Prime Ministers in London. Dr. Kwame Nkrumah spoke for his country.

Ghana is now a participating member of the International Bank and Monetary Fund, FAO, ICAO, WHO and UNESCO, and is also taking part in the International Geophysical Year studies.

Trade and good will missions have gone out from Ghana to all parts of the world.

Ghana called a Conference of Independent African States in April, 1958. This conference stressed the need to assert the African personality in the cause of peace, explored trade possibilities among the African states, called for the end of colonialism and racism.

The New Nation Faces Its Responsibilities

. . . HEALTH MUST BE IMPROVED

. . . EDUCATION MUST BE INCREASED . . .

The Prime Minister Promises to Meet Them

"My first objective is to abolish from Ghana poverty, ignorance and disease. We shall measure our progress by the improvement in the health of our people; by the number of children in school, and by the quality of their education; by the availability of water and electricity in our towns and villages; and by the happiness which our people take in being able to manage their own affairs. The welfare of our people is our chief pride, and it is by this that my government will ask to be judged."

This Is the Government

Dr. Kwame Nkrumah, the Prime Minister, was educated at Achimota College, Ghana, at Lincoln University and the University of Pennsylvania in the United States and London University. As in the British system, the Prime Minister is leader of the party in power (the Convention People's Party).

The National Assembly with 104 members representing all parts of the country is elected by universal suffrage.

The People Are Ghana's First Concern

The five million people of Ghana live in an area about the size of Oregon. They speak five major local languages, but English is the official language.

Ghana has complete freedom of religion. Sixty-six percent of the people follow their own African religions; 30 percent are Christians of many different denominations; and 4 percent are Moslems.

The people of Ghana respect the rights of women. They are free to own property and to vote.

Education Is Progressing on Every Level

Most of the education goals of the Accelerated Development Plan, started in 1952 under the first all-African Cabinet, have been met. There are now primary facilities for the majority of children and from 1951 to 1957 the number of students in teacher training colleges more than doubled, but Ghana needs more high school buildings and more qualified teachers.

Ghana's need is great for trained people in every field—engineers, architects, doctors, nurses, teachers, economists. Colleges are being enlarged and overseas scholarships offered to the most promising students.

At present more than 3,000 Ghana students are studying in foreign universities—about 220 in the United States.

New buildings and new courses are being added to the University College of Ghana, near Accra. This university has standards equal to those of London University.

Kumasi College of Technology is equipped for 700 students in engineering, commerce, accounting, agriculture, pharmacy and other technical fields.

Education in Ghana begins with the community. There is a mass education drive against illiteracy.

In a Builders' Brigade, youth with only a primary or incompleted middle school education are helping to build roads, schools and water systems while learning useful skills.

Ghana Is Improving The Health of Its People...

The modern 510-bed hospital at Kumasi has a training school for 300 nurses. Smaller hospitals are being built throughout the country. The national hospital at Accra is being expanded to serve as a teaching hospital.

Medical field units visit the villages—teaching sanitation and health precautions, inoculating against disease and treating the sick.

Women of the villages are taught proper infant care.

Bore holes which supply pure water for drinking are a big step in the battle against disease in rural areas.

New housing projects are mushrooming in the cities. Although the houses are built by private enterprise, convenient 20-year loans are granted by the government.

Members of a village society are eligible for assistance under a roof loan scheme when they have built a house to roof level. (In Ghana, roof materials are a major cost of the homes.)

...Changing

The Face of Its Cities...

...Building Better Communications...

Roads are being cut through the forests. Road building is one of the largest parts of the Development Plan. New bridges bring the country closer together.

Transmitters relay the Voice of Ghana in English and local languages. The Ghana News Agency sends local news and relays Reuters news by teletype to newspapers, businessmen, banks and government agencies.

In July 1958 Ghana established her own airline system, Ghana Airways, for domestic and international flights.

Ghana has no natural harbors. The only deep water port—at Takoradi—was built in 1928 and recently enlarged.

At Tema, near Accra, where an entire new community is rising, facilities capable of holding four ocean-going vessels are being built.

The Tema harbor and its connecting railroad are part of Ghana's contribution to the Volta River Project.

Ghana has launched her own merchant marine—the Black Star Line.

Cocoa Is Ghana's Main Source of Income

Cocoa is grown by about 300,000 small farmers, many of whom operate farms of a few acres.

The West African Cocoa Research Institute is seeking ways of combating plant diseases and improving crop yield. Results are shared with other African territories. Demonstrations and free advice are given to farmers all over the country.

Farming Is Being Diversified

To lower the cost of living and improve the national diet, farm production is being increased in both quantity and variety.

Mining and Timber Are Major Industries

Gold is Ghana's second most valuable export. Manganese, industrial diamonds and bauxite (used for aluminum) are major exports.

Most of Ghana's huge timber production is sold to the United States.

Ghana is Encouraging New Industries

Since Independence new consumer industries are being started almost every month—a biscuit factory, a match plant, bottling plants, furniture firms, a soap factory, sawmills and others.

Motorized fishing boats purchased through government loans are increasing the size of the catch. Formerly, fishermen were kept close to shore by the limitations of their dug-out canoes.

Investment Opportunities Are Attractive

Rather than relying mainly on foreign aid Ghana has initiated her own Development Plan of industrial investment. She is also encouraging private enterprise—both local and foreign—to participate in her growth.

"Again and again I have emphasized that we welcome foreign investment and will protect it," Dr. Nkrumah has pledged.

Unlike many other countries Ghana has built its new roads, schools and hospitals from cash reserves, not through loans.

Foreign investment opportunities in Ghana are attractive. In addition to government stability and protection, new industry receives rebates on taxes, waivers on import duties, low rentals on industrial sites and a plentiful supply of labor.

The Volta River Project Promises a New Industrial Era

Ghana has two natural resources close together which offer an unusual opportunity for development—bauxite and water power. If the Volta River is harnessed, it can supply power for a huge aluminum smelter, other industrial plants and nearby communities.

Eventually the project would produce almost a quarter million tons of aluminum yearly and would add a new source of income equal to all of Ghana's exports except cocoa.

An artificial lake—more than 3,000 square miles—would open new sources for fishing and new inland water routes. It would also provide water for irrigating nearby plains.

Plans call for a partnership of Ghana with foreign interests to construct a dam, power plant and smelter. Ghana has already begun to provide public works—the harbor, railroads, housing and water systems.

With large deposits of bauxite less than 200 miles away—plus a large labor supply—this project offers a profitable investment opportunity. A Preparatory Commission which studied this project recommended it as economically sound and technically feasible.

To Ghana the Volta River Project promises the opportunity to industrialize the country, diversify its exports, increase its total income and to improve nearby agriculture and health.

A New Era in World Friendship Lies Ahead

Americans—the famed and the unknown —public figures and entertainers—students and technicians—have all found their way to Ghana. They have been as much attracted by the unforgettable experience of seeing a new nation emerge as by the beauty, color and excitement of the land.

As one of the many evidences of its interest and good will, the United States has established a technical assistance program in Ghana.

A modern 100-room hotel has been built at Accra for the growing number of visitors.

In the United States Ghana's story is being told in continuing meetings between representatives from Ghana and American leaders, in contacts with civic groups, in friendly discussions between Ghana students and their American hosts, and by the printed word — all leading to increasing understanding between the two nations.

SHORT HISTORY OF GHANA

The present inhabitants of Ghana are believed to have begun entering the country some 700 years ago, in migratory waves from the north set in motion by the collapse of the great African kingdoms in the western Sudan. The first European contact was by the Portuguese, seeking gold. In 1482 they built Elmina Castle as a permanent trading base. Other European nations followed (the English in 1553) until the coast was dotted with forts. Early in the 17th century the trade in gold was superseded by the slave trade.

In 1821 the Crown took over from the British trading companies. By this time the British had become involved in wars with the Ashantis, the nation founded by Osei Tutu in the 17th century, and sustained by a belief in the power of the Golden Stool (said to have been plucked from the sky). In 1844 Britain signed a Bond of mutual co-operation at Cape Coast with the coastal chiefs.

After the Second World War, there was a nation-wide demand for more rapid progress towards self-government, and after a study by a commission presided over by the late Sir Henley Coussey the Gold Coast was granted a new constitution. Dr. Kwame Nkrumah, who had been educated in the United States, had returned in 1957 to join the United Gold Coast Convention, but in 1949 formed his own Convention People's Party. He was imprisoned in 1950 for declaring a "Positive Action" campaign, but while in prison was elected to the then Legislative Assembly in the first General Election in 1951. He was released to lead his party, which had won a sweeping majority in the elections.

The C.P.P. again won a majority in the 1954 elections which introduced an all-African Assembly, and held 72 seats in the 1956 election. Against its first organised opposition, a coalition of the National Liberation Movement (Ashanti) and the Northern People's Party, the Convention People's Party won 397,941 votes to the Opposition's 298,967 votes. The opposition parties subsequently merged to form the United Party.

The State of Ghana came into existence on 6th March, 1957, when the former Gold Coast Colony, Ashanti, the Northern Territories of the Gold Coast and the Trusteeship Territory of Togoland attained Dominion status and independence. The name of the country recalls a powerful monarchy which from the 4th to the 13th century A.D. ruled the region of the middle Niger. The Ghana Independence Act received the Royal assent on 7th February, 1957. The General Assembly of the United Nations in December, 1956, approved the termination of British Administration in Togoland and the union of Togoland with the Gold Coast on the latter's attainment of independence. Date of admittance to U.N. - March 8, 1957.

Prime Minister Nkrumah's visit to the United States, his first since becoming the head of government of the newly independent African state (he was last in the U.S. in 1951), grew out of an invitation extended by President Eisenhower through Vice President Nixon when Mr. Nixon visited Ghana for the March 6, 1957 ceremonies marking Ghana's birth as a nation.

A fast-moving program has been planned for the Prime Minister and his party while in the United States. In Washington the African leader will lunch with President Eisenhower, attend dinners given by Vice President Nixon and Secretary of State John Foster Dulles, be introduced from the floors of the Senate and the House of Representatives, and meet with diplomatic representatives of the countries of the British Commonwealth, to which Ghana belongs, as well as diplomats representing the independent African nations. A major address in Washington will be the Prime Minister's luncheon talk to the National Press Club.

In the course of a crowded day in Pennsylvania, where he will be escorted during the morning by the Honorable George S. Leader, Governor, and during the afternoon by the Mayor of Philadelphia, the Honorable Richardson Dilworth, Prime Minister Nkrumah will be guest of honor at a luncheon given by Lincoln University, from which he graduated, receive a citation from the University of Pennsylvania, which he also attended briefly, and climax the day with a reception in his honor given by the City of Philadelphia.

The Ghana Prime Minister's three-day visit to New York, where he will meet with Governor W. Averell Harriman and be guest of honor at a luncheon given by the Honorable Robert F. Wagner, Mayor of New York City, will include a series of

THE REVOLUTION IN MAN'S LABOR

THE REVOLUTION IN MAN'S LABOR

IN THE DARKEST HOURS OF HUMAN DESPAIR LIFE could never have seemed so transient as it appears to the present generation. Man has survived the cruel trials of natural selection only to face at last the direst of all threats to his existence: himself.

In an arms race that consumes the treasure and genius of civilization, one side—the one we tremble to call our own—has accumulated sufficient destructive capacity to annihilate the other 25 times over. And that other side, by this time, has equipped itself with 10 times the power to destroy us. Between us we are in a position to exterminate the entire species seven times over. Neurosis, senility, stupidity, accident—any of these at any moment may push the button on Apocalypse.

While time permits, we may stand in wonder at what man has wrought. He has taken in his mortal hands the source of energy that lights the universe through all eternity—or at least for 10 billion years past and 50 billion years to come, in the finite terms in which we measure infinity today. He can ignite stars on earth hotter than any that shine in the firmament. In the dread rehearsal of our last hour more than 300 such stars have already winked their blinding light under the roof of our increasingly polluted atmosphere.

We may marvel at the depth of understanding of nature and nature's laws that makes such deeds possible. Here, on the scale of destructive might, is a measure of the power of the rational method. In the chancelleries of the world the importance of natural philosophy is at last comprehended. The decisions of statesmen in every land are now heavily conditioned by regard for the destructive power of science.

It is ironic, though it is inevitable, that the threat now laid to human existence should be leveled by those same nations in which human life has for the first time experienced abundance. In North America and Europe west of the Urals, entire nations have enjoyed a well-being that has been reserved in the past to the fortunate elite. These nations are the first to have discovered, in the words of Bertrand Russell, "how to prevent abject poverty, how to prevent the pain and sorrow and waste of useless births condemned to premature death, and how to substitute intelligence and care for the blind ruthlessness of nature."

Why is it that the most fortunate people on earth should be on the verge of treason to the entire human race? There are unquestionably many reasons, to be traced at last to the forgotten bloody age, before the beginning of history, when Homo sapiens exterminated the less gifted species of the human genus. The habits learned then still take over on occasion in the behavior of individual men. In the behavior of states the resort to force and violence is sanctioned by all but one or two churches and by the most eminent moral philosophers. How else could states decide which is to have enough when there is not enough to go around? But in the very age in which we live there has come an essential change in the condition of human existence. The terrifying destructiveness of modern technology bespeaks a corresponding capacity for constructive solution of the ills of mankind. The revolution in man's labor that has come with the present amplification of our capacity for mass murder makes it possible for all men at last to enter into the human estate. The way of life that we are privileged to enjoy is now possible for all mankind. That is the essence of the change in the condition of man. If the nature of this change were more widely comprehended by citizens and statesmen, I have faith that an equal change could be worked in man's relationship to man.

But this declaration does not come escorted by a thunderclap. Its truth is not widely credited. The possibilities of human fulfillment to which it points are not generally comprehended even by those citizens and statesmen whose own style of existence furnishes the most compelling evidence in its support. The revolutionists try to forget the revolution. We embrace the good fortune that is ours and claim it as our birthright. In fear, we suppress the memory of the recent past and, in a world of increasing impermanence, persuade ourselves that our estate is perpetual.

The Last 15 Seconds

To such a state of mind it may be salutary to recall that the entire biography of man is but a recent event in the history of the earth. We surmise that our genus originated in a recognizable approximation of its modern form not more than one million years ago. In the five billion years that the earth has revolved around the sun those million years are the last 15 seconds of a day.

The first evidence of our species is dated on the order of 100,000 years ago, within the last two seconds of the earth's first day. In the flaked stone and sharpened bone we see that evolution has already assumed a new dimension. Man appears unique among the animals: he can transmit acquired characteristics to his offspring. Human infancy then as now was prolonged, and the primitive society of the family and tribe was already engaged in education. In the long, slow accretion of skills recorded in the exquisitely worked tools and weapons buried in the cave floors, we can see how successive generations selected and rejected and improved upon their heritage.

At some turning point, man mastered fire. The blackened bones and earth in the cave middens are not the only testimony. The vegetation over large parts of the Northern Hemisphere shows that Stone Age men used fire to clear the primeval forests and open up grazing lands for the wild game on which they preyed. With this new mastery of nature, the human species, about 20,000 years ago, radiated over the entire earth, crossing for the first time into the Western Hemisphere. Before the history of civilization began, men had occupied the margins of the Arctic ice, the desert, the prairies, the mountain forests and lonely islands in the distant ocean. These were the cultures of day-to-day survival—of hunters, fishermen, food-gatherers, inured to menace, formidable antagonists in the struggle for life.

The history of civilization, of the settled urban community, goes back no more than 10,000 years, less than two tenths of a second ago. By that time the food-gatherers had brought all of the food crops and all of the domestic animals we know today under cultivation and husbandry. They had learned also another use for fire. By confining it in a furnace they could raise the temperature from the 400 or 500 degrees of the open campfire to 1,000 degrees. Such temperature drives out the water of crystallization in pottery and bricks and made it possible to store the harvests and build cities.

Now, at last, want and the daily struggle for enough food to survive were lifted for a few members of the species. The new technology of agriculture required the labor of only four families on the soil to produce enough food to support themselves and one more family. The allocation of this surplus was secured by a social invention: the institution of slavery. In the ruins of the earliest cities we see the image of societies that built them: at first temples, later palaces, surrounded by fortifications and the hovels of the slaves.

Since it was now possible for the labor of four families to support a fifth in occupations other than agriculture, the range of technology broadened. The furnaces became hot enough to smelt copper and iron. The wheel and the sail appeared. The pulley and the lever, the pump and the bellows and other mechanical contrivances came into use. With the technological base thus broadened, the way was opened to high civilization and the beginning of recorded history.

In the record we discover three major centers: the Mediterranean, India and China. Later, in apparent independence of these, came the high civilizations of the Western Hemisphere. But in all of these centers, history and civilization were an experience of the few. The life of the rest of mankind, from Rome to Cathay, to the central plateau of Mexico, was wretchedly the same—and the same as before. Everywhere within the marches of civilization the ratio of four families out of five enslaved to the soil prevailed. And the first urban masses freed for other crafts and functions were enslaved in other ways.

Population Expansion Begins

Civilization, however, was a success. The human population expanded. Where it had taken 10 square miles of wilderness to support a single human being in the primitive economy of food gathering, now a few acres of agricultural land sufficed to sustain each human life. But the population of the agrarian civilizations pressed everywhere, at all times, on the margin of subsistence. As the land under cultivation expanded, so did the population; when harvests failed—or when the land failed under unwise exploitation—the population shrank. The fortunes of the most famous ancient states waxed and waned with the harvests and with outbreaks of epidemic disease. From the outside they were threatened by those they called barbarians, peoples still in transition from the Stone Age to neolithic culture. But as the slow trial-and-error advance of technology furnished weapons and more secure means of communication and the rulers learned to manage ever larger social organizations, states blossomed into empires, and history moved into the modern era.

In one form or another the institution of slavery persisted in almost every center of civilization on into the history of our own republic. Thomas Jefferson himself, whose 18th-century Enlightenment is evoked by the pleasant architecture of this College, once recorded his opinion that "Some numbers of men are natural slaves."

Contemporary Neolithic Man

If we wonder what life was like for ordinary people in those high and far-off times, we need not dig into archaeology or scratch for illumination in the history books that have so largely ignored them. We can see their technological contemporaries struggling for the same sort of life in the world today. They constitute, in fact, nearly two thirds of the human race. Principally in the Southern Hemisphere they are the peoples of what we have come to call the underdeveloped regions of the world. There, four out of five families are still bound to scratching their subsistence from the earth. Their life expectancy, until very recently, was between 30 and 40 years. This means that most of them die in infancy, at birth or in childbed. Their nutrition ranges from 1,300 to 2,000 calories per day, at least 500 calories below the minimum required to sustain the vigor of life. As late as the beginning of this century, famine and pestilence kept their increasing numbers in Malthusian equilibrium with the yield of the soil. The primary source of energy for their day's labor, as for neolithic man 10,000 years ago, is the metabolism of their own bodies. Literacy is the skill of a few in the village; ignorance and superstition are the shelter and solace of life.

Here and there we can find some tens of millions of men in a still lower estate. They are men of the Stone Age and in the first transition from food-gathering to the cultivation of jungle gardens. But they are quickly disappearing, some dying with their gods, others engulfed without trace in acculturation to the 20th century.

Contrast their condition with that of the inhabitants of Western civilization. In our own country, the labor of one family in six on the farm yields a harvest equivalent to an average of more than 10,000 calories per capita per day for the entire population. From this cornucopia we consume an average of a little more than 3,000 calories each, trading the surplus for an upgrading of the protein content of those 3,000 calories, to a hitherto unheard-of 30 per cent. Life expectancy is moving from 60 to 70 years. Famine and pestilence are echoes of Sunday School Bible lessons. The primary source of energy is the combustion of fuel; electrical power and internal-combustion engines furnish each of us with the equivalent of an average of 20 slaves. Our per capita income, a term of pure mystery to most of our fellow men, exceeds $1,800 a year and equips us to hanker for wants that are unknown even as luxuries elsewhere in the world. Almost all of our children are graduating from high school, and nearly 30 per cent of them are going on to college. The largest and the fastest-growing segment of our labor force is no longer in manufacturing, which long ago succeeded agriculture, but in the service industries and the trained professions.

So far as our citizens are concerned and for the overwhelming proportion of Europeans west of the Urals, material want has been effectively abolished. The improvement in their well-being above that of the general level of mankind was reflected two centuries ago in the steep increase of the population of Europe, the New World and the other frontiers occupied by Europeans. The expansion begins with the invention of the steam engine and accelerates to the highest rate of growth ever experienced by a major population at mid-19th century, when mechanically generated energy for the first time displaced the energy of human muscles. From 150 million in 1770, the white population has increased sixfold to nearly 900 million. In the same period the colored people of the world have only doubled their numbers, the largest increase coming in the last 50 years. The ultimate arrival of the white people in the condition of freedom from want is now testified by the leveling off of their population growth. With the increase in their production outrunning even their spectacular increase in numbers, they have found it possible and desirable to limit the size of their families and so to conserve and amplify the improvement in their well-being.

The Detail of Nature

How did it happen that more than one third of the human race arrived in a condition of such material advantage over the rest? To answer the question we must go back 400 years in the history of Europe, well back into the last tenth of a millionth of the last second of the world's day. At that time, in the European civilization that was rising from the ashes of the Classical Age, a new movement of discovery was under way. We may evoke the spirit of this epoch in the person of one man who personifies it in all its boldness and diversity: this was Leonardo. In the models of his inventions—displayed here at the College—we behold a Promethean vision of what was to come. The least successful of his inventions declare his reckless aim: to comprehend the forces of nature and subdue them to his purpose. But it is in his paintings that we see his most profound contribution to the emerging enquiry of science. "He is a painter," says the British mathematician J. Bronowski, "to whom the detail of nature speaks aloud; for him nature expresses herself in the detail . . . [he] gave science what it most needed, the artist's sense that the detail of nature is significant. Until science had this sense, no one could care—or could think that it mattered—how fast two unequal masses fell or whether the orbits of planets are accurately circles or ellipses."

It was the commitment to the inductive method —which begins with the detail of nature—that was to change the condition of man. This was the way to take the faculty of reason out of the cul de sac of mere logical tautology and on to the discovery of unity in nature. The first scientists were deeply imbued with the Classical conviction of order in nature, but the inductive method alerted them to discern the never-ending variety in which nature's unity finds expression. In a brief few years the scientific movement swept from Tycho and the perfection of his observations, to Copernicus and his boldness in choosing the sun-centered alternative, to Kepler and his ellipses, to Galileo who perceived the analogy between the motions of planets and the fall of unequal masses on earth and on to Newton who encompassed all motion in a single great world system. The triumph of the new method of natural philosophy was complete by the end of the 17th century.

Beginning in the 18th century, science gained its ascendance as a major enterprise of our civilization. Newton's physics was extended to every branch of enquiry into nature and everywhere extirpated the fallacies, myths and nonsense that had been cherished from earlier years. The universe ceased to be a realm permeated with vitalistic, purposive and capricious forces and opened up its most distant reaches to exploration by human mind.

During the past century, the movement has gathered constantly increasing acceleration. It was a century and a half, for example, from the discovery of the force of gravity to the discovery of electromagnetic forces; less than a century thereafter, to the discovery of the force that binds the atomic nucleus, and now less than a generation to the measurement of the weak forces that attend the mysterious decay of the ultimate particles of matter. Newton's grand generalizations are today encompassed in still more comprehensive statements of nature's underlying theory. Most recently the search for unity in nature, its perception sharpened by the inductive method, has uncovered the subterranean, looking-glass world of anti-matter. Nature apparently guarantees that there shall be no end to our enquiry. Each successful generalization uncovers new gaps in our experience and asks new questions.

Since ours is a civilization of action, there has been a parallel acceleration in the application of new knowledge. The nature of combustion—which had vitrified neolithic pottery and smelted the ores of the Bronze and the Iron age—was not comprehended until the end of the 18th century. The discovery of oxygen began the science of chemistry. Where once men could purify a mere half-dozen metals, there is now not a single metal in the table of elements that is not finding its way into use in modern technology. The fixation of nitrogen from the limitless ocean of the air a scant two generations ago removed the threat laid by nitrogen exhaustion to the world's food supply. From the study of the giant molecules of life has come the organic chemical industry which imitates life in the synthesis of new reagents, dyes, drugs and materials. Mathematics itself, the once inviolable muse of speculative thought, has given birth to mechanical computers, able to conduct centuries of calculation in a few hours, and to robot control systems that manage most of the major operations of our technology, which have become too complex, too fast and too dangerous for direct control by the human nervous system. Even astronomy has joined the applied sciences; it is from astrophysics that we are learning to subdue the inferno of the thermonuclear reactions, the last step that remains before man achieves access to the ultimate and, for all practical purposes, infinite source of energy on earth.

Until the scientific enterprise began 400 years ago the rate of invention hugged the time base line. The stock of technique increased by arithmetic progression, as often as not by accident and without real understanding of the principles involved. For the past three centuries, however, the progression has been geometric, climbing steeply toward parallel with the vertical coordinate. Now invention has entered a new phase. It exploits understanding already established; it responds not merely to necessity but to opportunity presented by new knowledge. So long as the enterprise of science is nurtured by society, technology will move forward with it.

Thus, as man's understanding deepens, his environment grows ever more responsive to his wants; the world's resources become as rich as his imagination. Does our appetite for metals at last exhaust the abundant ore beds of the world? According to Harrison Brown and his associates at the California Institute of Technology, we may turn to the granite of the continental masses and extract not only the full spectrum of mineral wealth but the fissionable elements that will provide the energy to power this "Age of Granite." Or we may turn to the oceans, with their limitless supply of hydrogen for energy, plus all of the minerals leached out of the continental rock by the rains and rivers. Do we require food? According to studies by the Food and Agriculture Organization, we can, with sufficient investment, expand the world's arable land seven times. The output of the land may meanwhile be multiplied past any prediction by the manipulation of life processes in plants and animals. Beyond the land lie the seas in which the major portion of the earth's organic matter is turned over in the great interlocking cycles of life.

Want Is a Social Problem

The outcome of the revolution in man's labor thus brings the elimination of want within the reach not only of the living generation of men, but of all the generations we can foresee. Those latter-day Malthusians who panic at the world's immediate prospective population growth may leave it to later generations to decide how numerous they want to be. Want is no longer a challenge to technology but to economics and politics. It is a social problem.

Not the least of the social problems posed by technology is the question: How can human dignity and freedom be maintained in a world organized to sustain the logistics of abundance? The management of the high technology of the future might find it in its power and convenience to tamper with the genetic constitution of the species or with the psychological processes of individual human minds.

But such questions beset us already in a society that is willing to contemplate suicide and listens every noontime to the wail of sirens. Is this the only face that we can turn to the world's dispossessed, to the 1,500 million beyond the pale of Western civilization?

They have heard the news of the revolution in man's labor. They are impressed by the example of our own nation, more than that of any other. Thanks principally to death control, they are living longer and feeling well enough to do something about their plight. The political turmoil of the no-longer colonial peoples provides the principal dynamics of this era of international political conflict. It is the power vacuum created by the breakdown of the old order in those regions that sucks the two great power systems to the edge of catastrophe.

In an acutely tender way, the wishes of these aroused people should be on our conscience. They are still extracting the irreplaceable resources of their lands to feed our voracious appetite for raw materials. Presently, in fact, we import from overseas sources iron ore, bauxite, oil and a host of precious commodities in a greater volume than ever before. In some sectors our technology is perilously dependent upon the riches they supply so cheaply. The good will and compliance of the natives have immediate relevance to our price structure.

We cannot stop at the churlish counsel that the colonials should reduce their numbers. Their population is rising because the modicum of sanitation introduced to protect the white colonials in their midst has reduced their rate of mortality as well. Their numbers are increasing, according to United Nations studies, at a rate that exceeds 1 per cent per year. Since the end of the Second World War their material condition has been in corresponding decline; their calorie intake has actually fallen.

To offset the claim of population growth and reverse the decline in their condition, they must increase their production at a rate greater than their population growth. The larger the differential, the faster will their lot improve. Such an objective is not only technologically, but politically and economically feasible. Our own industrial growth has averaged 5 per cent over long periods; it has even reached 8 per cent under intense pressure. The growth of our agricultural output has correspondingly proceeded at the rate of 2 per cent in normal times. In response to the economic cycle and to administrated prices and other regulatory devices, it fluctuates over an even wider range. The present curtailment of U. S. grain production represents 200,000 tons of grain, which fairly closely approximates the calorie deficit for the underfed portion of the world population. Such production records are not the exclusive characteristic of advanced nations. Under forced draught attained by political pressures obnoxious to our citizenry, the U.S.S.R., the first underdeveloped country to come up to 20th-century standards, has been achieving gains in industrial output at the rate of 8 per cent. The goals of their present agricultural programs are correspondingly high. Reports from China suggest that the government of that country has set no less ambitious objectives.

Hunger vs. Freedom

The success of both kinds of political and social management is proving increasingly attractive to the emergent economies of India, southeast Asia, Indonesia, South America and Africa. In their eyes, it is the results that count. As Prime Minister Nehru recently observed in the hearing of the American television public, hungry people are not ready to learn what we mean by freedom.

The task of industrialization involves some simple equations from classical economics. It is well known that the creation of capital requires savings. As Adam Smith long ago explained, saving means that the satisfaction of current want must be set aside to provide for future satisfactions. But when there is not enough to meet current want to begin with—which is the case in a Malthusian economic system—someone must starve to provide capital. Compulsion is usually necessary to persuade people to starve. In the present mood of the colonial peoples, however, they are ready to starve if it will do any good. And there are plenty of indigenous leaders ready to furnish the compulsion. This is what Prime Minister Nehru had in mind when he spoke of the secondary priority accorded to freedom in his electorate.

Now there is another alternative. The colonials do not have to go it alone. If we had conviction in our political and economic institutions and traditions—and a better understanding of their place in history—we would not willingly see these peoples submit themselves to compulsion. Out of the surplus capacity that troubles our market place we could meet a substantial portion of their need for capital equipment. Thanks to the labors of the international civil service of the United Nations and its accessory technical organizations, we have a pretty good idea of what it would cost.

A $500 Billion Program

Something on the order of $500 billion over the next 50 years would secure an average per annum gain of 2 per cent in industrial production and a corresponding increase in agricultural output in the areas concerned. This global figure comes out of reasonably detailed local studies; many of the projects are ready for preliminary cost accounting. Not all of the $500 billion would have to be supplied from outside. At about the halfway point, the new industrial centers would begin to generate some additional capacity of their own.

The bed rock investments, however, are not particularly attractive to the world's capital market. These involve such elementary public utilities as communication systems, including highways as well as railroads, and dams for flood control and irrigation. Investment in such projects would call for the kind of funds we now write off on armaments. On the whole, we would have to take a long-range view in looking for return on our investment. It would come eventually, however, as these economies cross the first hump toward the solution of their food problem.

Our technology is especially qualified to contribute to the soaring demand for electrical energy which will attend these industrialization programs. In a mature industrial system fuels are, by overwhelming tonnages, the biggest commodities in circulation. The mines and oil fields, the railroads, pipelines, docks and huge materials-handling depots that deliver coal and oil to our central power stations constitute one of the major activities of our economy. If the underdeveloped countries had to lay such foundations to achieve their electrification, they would have to wait for years. Here is a splendid market for our surplus of atomic bombs. A bomb is merely a high-speed reactor. Re-engineered and hooked up to a turbogenerator it becomes a power reactor. These high-density packages of energy, so well adapted for delivery by airplane and rocket, make it possible to electrify the frontier from scratch, with no preliminary investment in heavy engineering and construction. Hopefully, these man-made stellar engines will light the sky with the light that comes from windows.

But the demand for huge volumes of energy, heavy equipment and big investment would not come at the outset. First there comes lead time for planning and then engineering. Many of the early gains in these areas would be achieved, anyway, with very little expenditure on capital goods. The first requirement is for brains and knowledge.

An example of what can be accomplished in this phase of the undertaking is furnished by Mexico. For the past 20 years The Rockefeller Foundation has been working with the Ministry of Agriculture and Animal Husbandry of that country. At a cost of something less than $2 million per year, American agronomists have been supplied to Mexico, and young Mexicans have been trained in the agricultural sciences. In this period, the food production of the country has mounted 80 per cent. The gains have been achieved by improved yields of Mexico's own staple crops, the development of new varieties of wheat and potatoes and the establishment of something like our own county-agent system for farmer education. Not a single tractor or fertilizer plant is in the expense account; the money has been spent for the intangibles of information, education and expert consultation. The 4-per-cent per annum gain safely exceeds the 3-per-cent increase in population and has brought an improvement in the people's diet that is already showing up in the vital statistics.

Somewhere in our material and intellectual resources we can certainly find the capacity to expand on this precedent. If we could make a beginning we would soon have additional wealth and brains available for the task as a result of the attenuation of the arms race on which our prosperity now rests so heavily and insecurely. Whether our present distribution of values permits us to think we can afford action on these lines or not, political and economic necessity will soon supply crude compulsion.

As the principal revolutionists in the revolution of man's labor, our people more than any other have created the conditions that now confront mankind with the choice between extinction and the achievement of its yearning to fulfill its humanity. Surely it will not exceed our capacity for social invention to assume the role that ought to be ours in the making of that choice.

Dear Mrs. Miller:

Thank you for your letter.

It was nice of you to write and suggest that I include the topic of The Wilderness Bill in one of my programs.

Unfortunately, I cannot possibly use your suggestion, since my nightly news broadcasts deal with day-to-day news. My SMALL WORLD and PERSON TO PERSON programs consist of conversations and interviews.

I am sorry, but appreciate the time you took to tell me about it.

Sincerely yours,

Dear Sir:

The Wilderness Bill is a topic which I hope you might find worthy of discussion for national consideration.

As a layman whose interest in the passage of the Wilderness Bill is spurred by an active interest in Western history, and pleas of the National Wildlife Federation, I am writing to you.

On Sunday, November 16, 1958, the television premier of "Kaleidoscope" figuratively tipped the ball back to you with "The American Stranger." The Wilderness Bill seems to me to be a corollary of our Indian policy.

The Wilderness Bill has many legal and political manifestations which are coming out in heated discussions. Unfortunately, I cannot comment on the basis of a complete background. But I am an American, and I consider with pride, and perhaps a touch of the escapism attributed to joy in reading history, the people, deeds, and frontier lands which made our country and people what they are today.

Opponents of the Wilderness Bill are favored by the fact that the debate is shaping up as a "Sportsmen versus Land Resource Development" situation. With the vast areas already at their disposal, certainly the land resource developers should have adequate means to prove themselves.

Wilderness Bill areas might well be living land monuments not only to ourselves, but to our heirs, with tangible evidence of that which has combined to make this a great United States. True, we can't live in the past, nor do we want to do so. But no one builds the world he lives in today in one day, and a respectful and thankful reminder of the forces which molded our national character and pride may be our saving grace.

Yours very truly,

Dear Mr. Murrow:

In a President's Address which I am to make on May 18th to the State Convention of the Christian Churches in Indiana, I am to speak on the theme "Today's Church Facing Tomorrow's World" - which is already here.

I hope to be able to introduce something of the dramatic into this presentation by the use of some of the sounds of tomorrow's world, reproducing them by means of a tape recorder patched into the sound system of the auditorium. The address will open with words something like these: "Listen with me for a few moments to the sounds of tomorrow's world which are already a part of our world today." Then would follow some of these sounds:

A large missle as it is launched
The beep-beep of Sputnick
The e-e-e-e-e of the Explorer
A jet plane as it passes overhead
The sound, if any, of a large electronic computer as it prints its answer
An atomic explosion
Or others which are distinctively at part of tomorrow's world.

There will be an explanation of these sounds and the address would go on to: "But these are not the only sounds of tomorrow's world which has already come, the sound of machine and missle. There are other sounds, human sounds, that speak to us of the nature of the world in which we will live." Then would follow such sounds as these:

The voice of Khrushchev
The crowd gathered outside Central High School in Little Rock or any sound of jeering and personal insults shouted at Negroes.
A U.N. General Assembly being called to order
A portion of a hear or speech on the need of an expanded missle program that reflects some of the hysteria which has been shown in this matter
Eisenhower making an appeal for the education of more scientists
Or other voices in the same general theme

By now you probably have a pretty good idea of what this leads up to. Since you have done a great deal of this kind of thing in terms of your "See It Now" program and the recordings of "You Can Hear It Now" I thought you might be able to give me some help in getting together some of these sounds or others which would do the same job. Is it possible that you have something you could send me on tape or record? I shall be very happy to pay any reasonable cost for this - reasonable, that is, not so much in terms of cost to you, but to me. This job is all honor and no honorarium for me.

I do not see many television programs, but I do want to express my appreciation for the job you have done in the "See It Now" series. Particularly, I appreciated the one last year on the Clinton, Tennessee, story. The one on Marian Anderson's tour in Asia should be repeated.

Thank you for reading this rather lengthy letter. I realize that my request is unreasonable and that the leg work on my cock-eyed ideas for a speech are none of your responsibility, but if you can give me any help in supplying these things or have any suggestions as to other sources I would greatly appreciate it.

Sincerely yours,

Enclosed is my proposed letter to the Lord Mills. Please feel free to edit it or change it in any way which you think will improve it so that he will have a clear idea of what you want to do and then I will re-write it in my own inimitable way.

I would suggest that you try and fix a date with Percy in advance as these boys are fairly booked up. Lord Percy Mills

Dear Percy:

This will introduce a very close personal friend of mine, Edward R. Murrow, who lives right next to me in the country.

As you know, he was with the Columbia Broadcasting System and broadcast what was happening in England to America during the war. Since his return here, in addition to radio broadcasting, he has done a lot of television work and is rather specialized on interviews with heads of governments and outstanding leaders in the world. He is coming over to England the end of next week to do a television job on your boss. This will be reproduced to a very wide audience in the U.S.A.

One of the main things in his mind is to try and produce a picture which will make Mr. MacMillan recognizable as he is to the American public. Should he be successful creating and producing the right impression, obviously this will be of considerable value to the Prime Minister insofar as public reaction is concerned during his stay in the U.S. in June.

With this in mind, I thought it would be very advantageous if Ed could have a talk or dinner with you before he does the job on MacMillan as any personal sidelights might help him either in the presentation of questions or anything of that nature which would produce the effect referred to above which could only be of advantage. I know you will be most interested to help the Prime Minister in any way and am, therefore, giving Ed this introduction to you, in addition to which I am sure both of you will get along very well.

My love to Winifred.

Joan Saul

Dear Mr. Murrow,

I realize that I am being presumptuous in writing to you, yet I am spurred on by the thought that you were once in my position and by the knowledge that you are eminently well qualified to answer my question.

I expect to graduate from college with a B.A. in Economics this June. I have been considering making a career in radio, preferably in news work. Recently I wrote to a family friend, who is news director of a large CBS affiliate in the Pacific Northwest, telling him of my aspirations. He replied that he felt that I should seriously reconsider. He cited the decline of network profits, the trend toward disk jockies who read news off the wire between records, the trend of good entertainment away from radio and into television. All these factors, he said, indicate a very gloomy future for radio. He stated that the continuation of network radio as we have it today is in jeopardy.

I suppose that there is some truth in all he says, but I wonder if there are not alternative choices between failure and mediocrity. It seems to me that radio as we know it today has, with exceptions such as CBS, failed to live up to all that was expected of it in its early days. Rather than bringing the world into the living room, it has aimed at the lowest possible estimate of its listening audience and pumped it full of pap. I need not go into details, I am sure you are all too aware of them.

The public is, I think, getting tired of it. The change to television is not due entirely to its visual potential. How often one finds people listening to television when they cannot watch it. The change is due to the change in radio programming as well. (I don't believe that the public is satisfied with television either, but that is aside from my subject.)

My question is this: Would the public fail to respond to radio which is worthwhile? Is it not possible that radio could yet live up to the hopes which were held for it in its early days? It seems to me that it can. I feel that radio has gone through a long period of adolescence, rapid growth, often irresponsible, hungry for sudden glory, it has expanded rapidly until it reached its full maturity. Then, like a man old before his time, it bowed to a new adolescent, one somewhat more glamorous, more in the public eye. It suddenly felt old and unwanted, it lost its energy and, failing to realize its own uniqueness, it began to bow out as gracefully as possible. It seems to me that radio is just now reaching its maturity, its best years. No longer must it try to establish a visual tie between the listener and the scene, it can, rather, concentrate on aspects of news and entertainment in which the visual link is extraneous and superfluous.

I think of your recent Unit One broadcast on "The Business of Sex". That was as effective, or more effective, on radio than it would have been on television. News analysis is another area in which this is true, what does the face of the commentator add to the news? The same is true of many forms of entertainment and information.

Isn't it possible that radio can become a more useful (and profitable) force in our society by not trying to imitate television, but by going its own way in developing its unique potential? If the public could expect consistently good and interesting radio programs, might they not again begin listening to radio, at least when it wasn't convenient to watch television?

Frankly, I am looking for a change in radio, I would like to be in on that change. I believe that radio can serve a useful and profitable function. For example, it can give more, and better, local news (eg. Carroll Alcott on KNX), with analysis to let the citizen know how the actions of city, county and state government affect him. It can give the housewife something other than soap-operas and rock-n-roll during the morning and early afternoon. It can give the working man something more than three or four 15 minute sessions of the same news in different, or often the same, words as he drives home at night. It can give people of all ages and classes information on many subjects. I do not mean a forced feeding of "culture" or "intellectualism", I mean simply good forceful reporting and editorializing, with a point of view and interest on the part of the reporter.

I suppose this all sounds very idealistic to you, and perhaps it is. But is idealism necessarily impractical? Isn't it possible that a little more of it might prove more prifitable than the line which radio is now following? Or is it merely beating one's head against the wall to even try?

I will not take any more of your time by expanding my views further at this point, I'm sure you can see the point of view from which I operate. I would appreciate it if you could find time to let me know what you feel the future of radio to be, and if you think that a person who feels as I do could make a successful career in it. Please be honest, it can do me nothing but good.

Thanking you in advance, I am

Dear Mr. Murrow:

I have exhausted all of my limited means in trying to obtain a more definite address to write you; the above was the best I could do.

For sometime I have been seeking the advice of a person I could fully rely upon. I've thought of you many times, but for obvious reasons I have not written. I finally decided this was foolish procrastination on my part.

Your condensed article, "What's Wrong With TV?," in the February issue of Reader's Digest and your foreword in Vice Admiral Rickover's "Education and Freedom" prompted me into action. The article was so revealing of the American way of life. It held specific significance for me. Because I, like so many other young Americans, have been a victim of this way of life. Admiral Rickover's book substantiated the theme of your article with unpleasant truths.

I am hoping you will be kind enough to help me "make up for lost time". I've followed your commentaries, articles and books for several years. If I didn't feel you were the man your tireless efforts show you to be, I wouldn't be writing the letter I am.

I'm sincerely interested in radio and television as a vocation. Not for the glory of it, nor a spot in the limelight; I am aware of the rough, steep road that lays before me. But to try and do my part in showing American citizens the precarious problems that hover over them. Since I am interested in becoming a correspondent and eventually qualifying myself as a news analyst, I am writing to you.

I would be grateful Mr. Murrow if you would advise me on how to better prepare myself for this field. So that you may better formulate my position, I would like to submit this background:

1. I am 23 years old and have one year remaining to complete my military obligation.
2. I graduated from Kansas State Teachers College, Emporia, Kan., 1957.
3. Majored in speech---minored in business.
4. Two years commercial radio---sports director and staff announcer.
5. Presently working as a journalist aboard the heavy cruiser USS NEWPORT NEWS.

I have given serious thought to a European university where I would study political science. I felt this would give me an opportunity to observe first-hand, what is actually taking place. Do you think this idea is sound? I am somewhat lost on how to iniate my desire. That is why I am hoping you will be able to enlighten me on a definite path to follow.

I believe your interest in Americans and their welfare is sincere Mr. Murrow; so is mine. I believe, with careful preparation, I have the capacity to fulfill this desire.

Thank you very much for reading my letter Mr. Murrow. I realize your busy schedule but I have faith that you will write me a short note on what you think is the best method to prepare myself for the field.

Respectfully yours,

FOR RELEASE JANUARY 28

The newly designed pocket-size booklet THEY REPRESENT YOU 1959 has just been published by the League of Women Voters of the City of New York. A copy is enclosed.

This reference lists New York City's elected representatives in the local, state and national governments, their addresses and the correct salutation for each. It encourages citizens to express their views to their legislators and gives hints on how to write an effective letter. The fact that many citizens are unable to name the U. S. Congressman who represents their district was revealed in a survey made about a year ago. The Institute of Public Opinion queried high school and college graduates in a poll for "Look" magazine and discovered that only 43% knew who their elected representatives were.

THEY REPRESENT YOU answers such questions as: Who are your representatives? How can you communicate with them? Will your opinion affect their votes? What districts do you live in? Information is also included on registration and voting, as well as colored maps for easy location of the districts in which the voter lives.

The New York City Board of Education has ordered 70,000 copies for use as a citizenship text in the seventh-grade classes of all junior high schools. THEY REPRESENT YOU 1959 is available at twenty-five cents a copy from the League of Women Voters of the City of New York, 461 Fourth Avenue, New York 16, New York.

The League of Women Voters is a national, nonpartisan organization which works to promote informed and active citizen participation in government.

Greetings !

Christmas is almost here again and many things from last Christmas are still out. There they will probably stay until after the holidays (no telling which holidays though). But it certainly is time to send you my best wishes for a joyful holiday season and new year. A Merry, Merry Christmas and A Happy New Year to you !

My previous letter referred to my "eviction" by the University from both office and room while I was in Ceylon and India and the subsequent complications, among them the difficulty for months in getting at my clothes, to say nothing of books, notes, and records. The movers had stuffed everything haphazardly into crates. Not until last spring did the bookcases and other office equipment come. It then became possible to organize my office once more. More accurately, I should say that the office now is no more disorderly than usual. Orderly men and most women take one look at the office, gasp, and throw up their hands in despair. The more courageous may just keep that stiff British upper lip and brave it. One problem, of course, is that I do not enjoy moving and packing since such chores seem to me a waste of time much better spent in loafing, visiting, or working.

The apartment remains chaotic, mainly unfurnished. My Japanese things are scattered about in various stages of unpacking, some items waiting for the still non-existent tables. Fortunately for me, it is not too far from the university and the time saved by not commuting supposedly more than covers the time needed for its upkeep. In common with many abstract theories, this notion overlooks my attitude toward domestic chores.

As all these comments suggest, this year has been rather busy but not very productive. It is interesting to note how much any degree of efficiency depends on familiar setting and predictable help. The loss of nearly all secretarial service (as a part of the supposed "economy" by the University) since my return from Ceylon has ruined what little efficiency I ever had, a doubly annoying situation since I had hoped to do some substantial amount of writing. Perhaps one should accept such a development, but the remaining traces of my engineering background still prod my conscience to do something about it. I rebel, but butting one's head against stone walls is no fun either. Now and then, I begin to wish I had accepted one of the invitations for next year from foreign universities. Perhaps something will get done despite the handicaps.

At any rate, I look forward to hearing from you. Please do not use my old 145 Bay State Road address--I have not lived there for three years. Including the university in the above address will improve the chances of correct delivery in this city which, the Post Office Department in Washington says, has a very inefficient service.

With best regards and wishes of the holiday season,

Cordially yours,

Scotty

Several friends were very interested in Hawaii becoming a state and had thoughtful observations on its significance, as well as that of the Alaskan statehood and rapid growth of the Pacific Coast states. The better newspapers and periodicals have commented on the more obvious implications of the Hawaiian statehood, but I should like to suggest that other substantial benefits to the United States may be overlooked. Historically, such gains are often taken for granted. We may consider, for instance, a nation with a constitution which protects its citizens from arbitrary injustices. If these rules are enforced, the people will enjoy security of life and rights and may appreciate their good fortune, but they will still have no way of estimating how much arbitrary injustice these constitutional provisions prevented. Similarly, Hawaian statehood will help the United States in many ways not readily perceived. More obviously, it should improve our basic position in relation to various Asian and perhaps African nations, particularly as they begin to understand the meaning of American citizenship (thus, Eisenhower mentioned our Hawaian experience the other day in India). Please note I said basic position, and not relations as such which depend so much on our leadership and diplomacy. The best position in the world is no substitute for intelligence, understanding, and leadership.

Domestically, Hawaian statehood symbolizes great progress for American democracy. Racism has been a persistent defect in American democracy from the first. The Declaration of Independence and the Constitution, of course, had and still have great universal appeal (hence, ideas in the Declaration seem subversive to many members of the so-called patriotic societies). The major movements, religious and secular, which subsequently rose to realize these democratic ideals were often tainted with racism. As some historians have suggested, a modern nation cannot uphold both democracy and slavery without regarding the slaves as genetically inferior, if not subhuman. Nor can a people conquer a vast continent without similarly rationalizing about its original inhabitants (during the conquest). American democratic movements usually accepted racism without serious question. Indeed, as Dr. H. Richard Niebuhr shows in his study of the American denominations which revolted against the more aristocratic churches, racism was so respectable that these democratic denominations generally did not even rationalize their racism although they developed theological rationalizations to justify other forms of discrimination. Over the past fifteen years I have read hundreds of early nineteenth century church records, including journals of leaders and members and minutes of meetings, and find his observation valid, and if anything, understating the virulence of the prevailing racism. Jacksonianism, of course, was one of the outstanding secular movements responsible for achieving many democratic goals, of which today we Americans are justifiably proud and which had profound influence on European life as well. Here again, however, while the gains made by the poorer classes as a whole greatly helped many Negroes and perhaps even a few Indians, Jacksonianism generally cared little about them and seemed more anti-Indian and anti-Negro than some conservatives were.

Particularly after the Civil War, an increasing number of individuals began to challenge the prevailing outlook. Yet, progress, if any, was spasmodic—rapid gains in some years, decided retrogression in others. Thus institutionalized Jim Crowism (as distinct from individual prejudice) was not legally integrated into American life until almost the end of the century. Again, in the 1920's the Ku Klux Klan rose to great power and dominated not only some Southern states but also several Middle Western states. The racist influence corrupted even American science. Scholarly scientific journals published spurious "research" data allegedly proving "Aryan superiority." More pernicious were the technically accurate "findings" which supported racism by excluding, deliberately or unconsiously, the facts which would have given quite different meaning to such "studies." Eventually, the public rejected the Klan politicians, and real scholars were also able to publish the results of more thorough investigations.

Toward persons of Oriental origin, American attitudes were ambivalent, to say the least, at times depending upon the personal views of individual community leaders. In some places, they were readily accepted. In other periods and places they faced organized hostility after vested interests discovered how to organize anti-Oriental agitation for their own purposes, somewhat as business and political interests in several Southern states to this day often use racism to advance their own objectives, for example to block unionization. A nineteenth century Mayor of San Francisco, Dennis Kearney, has the dubious distinction of being an outstanding pioneer in organizing anti-Chinese campaign to cover up the impending exposure of his corrupt administration. In such an atmosphere, of course, a serious examination of the immigration, civil rights, and Americanization problems to resolve the difficulties became virtually impossible. So at one stage, an observer could see in some cities individuals of at least partial Japanese or Chinese ancestry among the social elite or making significant contributions to American life, while at the same time in other places persons of Oriental background were systematically excluded from many fields of employment, including academic. Before World War II, of the thousands of West Coast Americans of Japanese ancestry trained in the sciences, engineering, arts, and humanities, how many found employment consistent with their qualifications unless personally helped by some influential leader willing to battle individually for their rights? The discrimination was serious enough that a number of the West Coast civic leaders were becoming concerned.

The racist twist to American naturalization laws (a peculiarity that this country shared with South Africa and later Nazi-Germany—scarcely a good democratic company) complicated matters. Interesting enough, although the more discriminated against Africans could become naturalized citizens, Asians could not. I am obviously referring to residents from Asia, not to native born who were citizens by birth. Some states singled out Orientals by legally barring persons "ineligible to citizenship" from certain professions and owning real estate. Under these laws, during World War II, when an American GI of Japanese ancestry died on the battle front fighting for his country (the U.S.), these states automatically confiscated his property since his parents, as persons "ineligible to citizenship," could not own real property. It was not a very inspiring spectacle to see a state reward a hero's supreme sacrifice for his country by confiscating his property and leaving his parents destitute. Shocking but true at one time. Was it much more edifying to see our government hastily releasing the mother of a dead war hero from a relocation center (to which she had been sent along with all others of Japanese origin purely because of her ancestry) so that the grateful nation would not be embarrassed by having to give her in a de facto concentration camp the Congressional Medal of Honor, our highest military decoration, awarded her son? The government subsequently also named a military transport ship in his honor.

These comments lead once more to what the present Dean of Yale Law School categorized as the greatest blunder committed by the American government in World War II, the West Coast evacuation under which every single person, every single American citizen, if of more than one-sixteenth Japanese ancestry (did General DeWitt learn about this from the Nazis?), was forcibly removed from the Coast and temporarily interned without being charged with any crime, let alone having a trial. Was security involved? Not at all. To put the record straight again, the American government itself has once more officially stated that security was not involved. You may have seen in the newspapers several months ago that in winding up the compensation program, for the losses arising from the evacuation, the Attorney General of the United States and the Department of Justice publicly apologised to the evacuees for the injustices they had suffered and made clear once more that bigotry had dictated the evacuation and security needs had nothings to do with it. We have long known this fact, of course, since the government has discussed the situation several times before and since the security agencies such as the FBI and the Naval Intelligence had opposed the evacuation in the first place, but it is a refreshing and heartening evidence of our democratic vitality to have our government so frankly admit its mistake. The evacuation was initiated by an alliance of professional racists, powerful yellow press, opportunistic politicians, and again the large vested interests in real estate, canning, and agriculture (many California agricultural combines are huge corporations, not individual farmers) which saw a golden opportunity to eliminate the successful independent competition from the Nisei and Japanese and to seize their highly productive farms. The public in the meanwhile had kept its bearings and so the instigators unleashed an unprecedented propaganda campaign through their press, radio, state agencies, and other channels to induce the public to demand the evacuation. General DeWitt helped them and is still remembered for his "classic" assertion that citizenship was only a meaningless scrap of paper (the Army had to "retire" him shortly afterwards). Significantly, Hawaii had no hate campaigns or evacuation. The difference is obvious. It had no vested interests and organized racists trying to steal their neighbors' property and it did have competent military commandants who believed that citizenship was basic, indeed one of the great democratic rights over which the war was being fought. As we know all too well in retrospect, the evacuation not only viciously hurt its victims and damaged American reputation, but also set a dangerous precedent, "a loaded gun" as Supreme Court Justices Jackson and Murphy suggested, available to any powerful interests to deprive their fellow citizens of their basic rights without justification or reason.

Thoughtful Americans began to form organizations to counter this hate campaign. Several officers of the JACL (Japanese American Citizens League) and other Nisei were also active. Mike Masaoka did a great job in Washington clarifying the thinking of some key officials and prodding the government to begin cleaning up the mess it had created and helping to restore Nisei military service, temporarily suspended during the evacuation hysteria. Yet, the race for sanity was close. For example, the Stewart bill to intern every person of more than 1/32nd (or was it 1/64th) Japanese origin almost passed the Senate under unanimous consent--only three senators objected. This delay enabled concerned persons to notify thousands of citizens who told their senators what they thought of this vicious proposal. Had it passed, there could have been no war record of the Nisei and this country would have come close to being a Nazi-like racist state.

New York was another center of the fight. It was very flattering of the JACL National President to say in a recent address that I had a significant role in changing the attitudes of the leading newspapers and magazines. My role was very limited--to get the facts from the JACL and others, present them to influential friends with contacts with editors and publishers, and ask them in turn to discuss the matter with their editor friends. Once the editors had this fuller story, they took greater interest in exposing the hate propaganda and in featuring the Nisei heroism on the battle front. I also cooperated with other friends who were already active in various church, civic, and welfare organizations helping the evacuees to resettle and start life over again. Often, it took real courage for them to stand up for justice and to combat the hate, and in any case, they had to devote much time and effort. I should like to emphasize that not only the Nisei and loyal Japanese residents, but all Americans owe these brave spirits a deep debt of thanks.

The public began to change its opinion with the news of the Nisei battle front heroism. As General Stillwell bluntly stated, the Nisei bought a big chunk of America with their lives, blood, and guts. In both World War II and the Korean War, per capita the Nisei suffered more casualties and won more medals and decorations than any other sizable American ethnic group. Since then, persistent efforts and favorable public opinion have removed nearly all discriminatory legislation, including the naturalization law. Today any qualified person is equally eligible to become a citizen. By and large, citizens of Oriental ancestry enjoy virtually the same rights as those of European origin. It was both deliberate and symbolic that the Nisei veterans were asked to lead the major military parade and the memorial services during the Hawaiian statehood celebration, for as the Governor observed, ultimately it was the Nisei lives, blood, and guts which won the statehood. The Congressional racists could no longer convince the majority. The battle for equality is not fully won, as shown by the recent, nationally syndicated scurrilous comments by Ruark and the TV insistence on showing war-time hate films--those featuring Nisei engaged in sabotage and espionage (all false). Yet, I think Americans of Oriental background have reached the stage in American life where they should even more actively join with others to protect the less privileged and to promote national welfare. We all need to remember that no American is safe unless all have equal justice.

These Christmas letters for ten years have dealt almost entirely with international topics. Although this one refers to domestic issues, we should be aware of their international implications. How much impact did the past anti-Oriental agitation, anti-Oriental land laws, and discriminatory practices have on pre-war Japan? Again, I admire many qualities of Wilson, but we must condemn his elimination of the racial equality clause from the Covenant of the League of Nations. On this issue, all Asians agreed, however much they differed on other problems. Several English friends have reminded me of the American role in ending the historic Anglo-Japanese alliance. Instead of linking Japan to the democratic West, America drove Japan out, partly for political reasons and partly for racist reasons (encouraged by South African and British Columbia racists). The 1924 Oriental Exclusion Act marked a fateful watershed. This act was followed by apparently double standard of American activity in the Far East--permissiveness toward Russian and European imperialism and lofty moralistic hostility toward Japanese penetration. We might have been more realistic about the consequences of our policy, but as one observer stated it, FDR had only contempt for Japan and treated it as he would San Marino or Andorra. We had pulled the rug under the feet of Japanese civilian moderates and helped to put the military fanatics into power. The next stage was Pearl Harbor.

Today, we confront in communist Russia and China giant powers dominated by an implacably hostile ideology. Powerful but stupid forces in America would help Khrushchev bury the United States--for instances, the demands for ending foreign aid and for raising tariffs when our trade is still favorable (imbalances arise from military needs). I have often criticised specific mistakes in our foreign projects, not to help end them but to help make them effective. My statements were like those of a public relations advisor thoroughly convinced of his client's merits. We cannot live smugly on a prosperous island in the rising tide of economic despair. Neither can we naively inflict our ways on others. International and intercultural relations are complex and require understanding and wisdom, not merely technical skill. Despite their mistakes and rigidity, the Russians have already made considerable headway in some countries. Neither military power alone nor negative defensiveness will give us security. Either we provide the leadership or they will, and leadership requires patience and understanding as well as ability. Either we give to these momentous problems more serious attention than we even give to the shape of automobiles, liquor bottles, or cereal boxes, or we may have no future. We helped to create this dynamic world and we either move ahead or we lose our birthright. Our very lives depend upon assuming our responsibilities wisely, patiently, tolerantly, and resolutely. ((I wrote the above without notes, but the material should be essentially correct.))

Dear Mr. Murrow:

I am in the process of preparing a series of dramatised Television shows which promise to establish correlations between Education and Crime, based upon my personal experiences as both teacher and parent who has endeavored to educate and rehabilitate the children of allegedly notorious gangsters. There are times when the professional man has to keep his mouth shut because he may not disclose even the names of his clients, patients, pupils, or, indeed, sources of information. You will recognize me as the "Professor" who appeared (and remained silent) before the so-called McClellan Senate Rackets' Committee, more than a year ago. Actually, it has been recorded by that same Committee, that "it must be said that throughout this legislative inquiry, we have not found Don Modica (sic) guilty of a single criminal thought or act." But the "press boys" and TV, and radio, and all the other media had their Roman holiday....and at unspeakable cost and suffering to my family. I will not dwell here upon the details. Mirabile dictu, I have become "hot copy" !

Quite reasonably, therefore, I take a dim view upon the editorialists of today whose hearts (and large advertising accounts) bleed for the Big Business Executive whom you are charged with maligning on your recent program, the "Business of Sex." Fight back, Mr. Murrow, for sex is all over the place. You have succeeded in bringing the problem into bold relief in the public consciousness. Then do not back away from it. Sex is not a "controversial" subject. Quite the contrary, it is here to stay. The evidences are abundant. The Great Unwashed knows, and those who, "for the first time in their lives are really clean", will continue to "use de goils." From the lowest to the highest levels of economics and society, my Dad (R.I.P) used to say: "There's a difference between class and ass---and it shows."

Prostitution is merely one form of delinquency. Like the other aspects of Crime, my "clinical" observations show that it is, in its origin, nature, and causes, psychological. The social and economic aspects are, simply, accidental criteria, as I will endeavor to show im my own programs. We have been dealing with crime, especially since 1916, with emphasis placed upon the punitive and therapeutic approach. But little has been done to define the preventive approaches, viz., as I have stated, supra, the continued consideration of the origin, nature, and causes of crime. I support this statement with some simple, recorded data: (1) In 1939, the Crime Bill paid by the the U. S. Taxpayer was eleven times larger than the national Education Bill; (2) In 1958, the Crime Bill was fourteen times larger. And yet, we have never, in the history of American Education spent so much money for "bigger and better schools!" These are facts, Mr. Murrow. To dig them up, the investigator needs to go out of the classroom and t ake up his position in the most likely human laboratories, the bars and saloons, the "cocktail lunges" (where the client will find ample opportunities to bridle the "tail" and unbridle the "cock"), the hatcheck girl who, for a two-dollar police "license", is licensed to be the two-faced Ianua, seeing who comes in and who goes out. No pimps for them, for they are "discreet" whores. They are licensed, as "independents" or as "mesdames." They know the "live ones" and the "stiffs." Ah, how many innocent wives are the victim of the "shock" treatment, administered primarily to induce amnesia, because of the husband who follows the daily ritual of the after-work "lounge!" These, too, go on the "expense account". How can the Revenue Boys police them all? Their best "out" is state publicly that the problem of prostitution is negligible, or that it does not exist. This, is amazing and ridiculous, Mr. Murrow, not your broadcast! The youngest street urchim knows that you have not even scratched the surface!

Unquestionably, the "crime story" is a TV and Radio "best Seller." But I think (and I know, I daresay) that there are techniques to dramatise it so that many so-called "pressure groups" will espouse and encourage it , rather than condemn it. Such techniques, in the hands of able, experienced creators and producers should prove themselves to be of inestimable values to the networks, the sponsors, the agencies who represent them, and, certainly, a boon in the ways of enlightenment, interest, entertainment, and lasting service to the consumer public who, believe me, are NOT the subnormally intellectual suckers that some uninformed drumbeaters would have us believe!

I should cherish the privilege of exchanging views, but not with polite secretaries. As Ed Murrow would say: "Good Luck!"

Very cordially yours,

Don Modica

Dear Ed:

It's only fair to warn you that if you do drop in on us in Alaska, while you'll be most welcome, we'll probably hand you a hammer and some nails. From the time we arrive in July until winter sets in, we're going to be hard at work building a log cabin for ourselves. It's the best solution we could think of to the housing problem up there, and, at the same time, an opportunity to turn our six little spoiled victims of civilization into good, old-fashioned hardy pioneer-types.

To answer your question, I will be stationed at Ladd AFB, Fairbanks, with the 11th Air Division as Information Services Officer. The mailing address is Hq 11th Air Division (SAC), APO 731, Seattle, Washington.

We were all entranced by your letter and the possibility of a visit, knowing the value of the time represented. Congratulations on the well-deserved Emmy Award and good luck with that poltergeist!

Sincerely,

John D. Monaghan

Dear John:

Thanks for your delightful letter. We have only one poltergeist at home and there have been times when I attempted to give up and let him take over.

I have no doubt at all that you require another in Alaska in the form of the mysterious snowman. I hope no gremlins accompany you on the trip to Alaska. How I envy you that journey! By the way, where are you to be stationed? We might just drop in one day.

Dear Ed:

We have poltergeists too!

We never thought much about them until we saw your recent tele-cast. Now, we've decided that our poltergeists are a little bit different, and you might agree. They've been with us for a long time, and the most unique thing about them is that they don't seem to be restricted to any particular locale - they go with us wherever we go. Right now, we're all deep in preparations for a trip to Alaska where we plan to make our home for three years - and we know the p.g.'s are getting ready too - they always do.

If you find this hard to believe, you might be interested in the events of the past week - all unexplained. For seven straight days a poltergeist has gone into Johnny's (age 5) room after he left for kindergarten and thrown his pajamas, which he had carefully hung in the closet, on the floor. On Monday another p.g., the one who specializes in imitations of the children's voices, did a perfect imitation of Sharon (age 7) hollering outside the baby's door. Tuesday, just before lunch, there was a hungry one in the house - he ate what was left of the chocalate Easter eggs out of everyone's basket - this so upset Jo (age 5) that she completely lost her appetite for lunch. Wednesday, the destructive one was here, scribbling big circles on the face of the new television set, and, as usual, he was invisible. At 4 o'clock in the afternoon we were sitting in the living room, feeding the baby, when a rock came flying through the air and hit the picture window - all the children were in the front yard at the time, but none of them saw it happen. Thursday was fairly quiet, with only the dirty poltergeist, who goes into the bathroom after the children and wipes his hands on their towels. Friday was quiet too, only because Chip (age 8) took a poltergeist to school with him - this particular one, known affectionately in the family as "Jack the Ripper" did his usual thorough job on the knees of Chip's pants. Saturday the Pat Boone poltergeist fan was here - he's the one who writes "I love Pat Boone" all over the best stationery, the un-read magazines, and the floor of the porch. He's had quite an influence on Robin (age 10), who insists on staying up late to watch Pat Boone on television - evidently investigating the attraction. It's been a fairly normal week at the Monaghans.

All in all, we figure we must have about seven resident poltergeists - added to six children and a dog, it looks like there'll be quite a crowd aboard our newly bought trailer en route to Alaska. We sure would like to have you come visit us before we leave on June 6th - we can almost guarantee a super-natural occurrence - but if you can't make it we'll keep you posted. The way we acquire poltergeists, we'll undoubtedly have some Eskimo poltergeists to write you about after we get there.

Sincerely,

John D. Monaghan

WORLD COMMITTEE ON PEACEFUL COOPERATION

INVITATION

Dear Mr. Murrow:—

December 7, 1958

The world spirit is changing. It moves toward cooperative thought and action. More than ever before world leaders feel their grave social responsibilities for the survival and progress of mankind.

To aid this trend we call your attention to the enclosed plan for a World Committee on Peaceful Cooperation, which will initiate specific proposals in the field of international cooperation. It will do this as a continuing research project using a method of consultation based upon a system of timed correspondence with summarized findings.

The group of persons whose names appear on our letterhead have the following purposes in view:

a. To invite outstanding world leaders to study specific problems and through correspondence to propose and consider solutions.

b. To achieve agreement on recommendations and to submit them to the peoples of the world through various media of communication, includ- conferences and study groups.

c. To encourage appropriate action through educational, scientific, church and other cultural organizations, and through governments and organizations of the United Nations.

The details of the plan are necessarily preliminary and tentative. To us the genius of this project is that it invites and encourages a free and responsible discussion of the problems on whose solution our very lives may depend. It is "free" because it is attached to no organization. It is "responsible" because it is an interchange----less formal and more personal than is usually provided us----among persons whose lives and professions are evidence of great social responsibility.

We personally wish to be a part of this arrangement and we invite you to be one of the American correspondents. Our Preparation Committee has nominated forty leaders in various fields for this honor; their names are attached; this invitation goes to each of them today.

The number of nominees per country is based primarily on population. In all, three hundred are being invited, with all countries represented. The individual nominees have been selected as far as possible on the basis of leadership accomplishments. You will find further details in the attached material.

May we hear from you soon? Please address your reply to D. M. Morandini, Executive Secretary, WCPC, 7367 Hollywood Boulevard, Los Angeles 46, California.

WORLD COMMITTEE ON PEACEFUL COOPERATION

The WCPC is a research project in social integration. Its purpose is to assist the peoples of the world in finding acceptable solutions to the most important problems of our day. These problems include: elimination of conflict; methods of dealing with conditions of suffering and ignorance; improvement in production; improvement in communication among nations; ways of establishing higher levels of effective cooperation among social institutions; and other problems which at present are obstacles to the material and mental progress of mankind.

We are inviting 300 world leaders from all major fields of human endeavor (not including government representatives) to function as members of the Committee for several years. They are being asked to write the Committee once every three months setting forth their views on basic world problems, and giving their recommendations on steps that governments should take to solve them. We are not including government representatives on the Committee because the recommendations of the Committee will go to them and are intended to aid them.

The communications from the members of the Committee will be summarized. (Committee members are asked to provide their own summaries when possible.) All of the summaries will be sent to the invited correspondents in mimeographed form so that each may know the views and recommendations of all the others.

Through the quarterly abstracts it is the purpose of the Committee to propose recommendations which will correctly express the views of the group as a whole. These recommendations will be submitted for vote to the Committee members.

The achieving of agreement on recommendations is the first step in the Committee's procedure; the second step is submission of the Committee's recommendations to the peoples of the world through the various media of communication. Comments will be called for; significant contributions will be summarized and sent to the Committee members.

After a suitable, but not long, period after release of the Committee's recommendations and after abstracts of the most valuable comments have been made, the 300 correspondents will be asked to make use of the general comments and make any ammendments they choose. The amended recommendations together with summaries of comments will be printed for use by Committee members assembled at a World Congress where the final form of agreed recommendations will be discussed and voted upon. The amended recommendations will be sent to all Committee members prior to the Congress ----to those expecting to attend as well as to Committee members who find it impossible to be present personally at the Congress.

After the adjournment of the World Congress the final agreed recommendations will be printed with signatures. It will be translated into possibly a dozen languages, and will be printed in each of them. The book will be sent with appropriate letters to all the governments of the world, to the United Nations, the educational, philosophic, scientific, industrial, art, church and labor associations and academies of the world, asking for their cooperation in the realization of the recommendations or as large a part of them as possible.

World leaders consulted thus far consider WCPC a magnificent project of utmost world importance and assure the Committee of their most enthusiastic cooperation.

Through goodwill, integrity, objectivity and concern for mankind, the work of WCPC will be facilitated.

REGARDING THE WCPC RESEARCH PROJECT

A Memo to Nominees

At the WCPC we believe the cooperation of the individual in this important research project should not be restricted by any "team work" centrally directed or administratively suggested.

The uniqueness of the project is expressed through the arrangement in which the outstanding persons who participate "work together as individuals" at their homes, laboratories or institutions, situated over the world.

Participants thus have the stimulating influence of one another's thinking on common projects through an organized correspondence, with no burden of writing individual letters and without the restricting effect of a forced common physical environment.

All who take part in the project are at perfect liberty if they wish, of course, to write individual letters to fellow project participants.

Although we ask each of WCPC's 300 correspondents----world leaders from all countries----to honor us with one letter quarterly, together with a ten-line summary of it, we do not consider this request a hard-and-fast rule. There will be some correspondents who may feel they should write more often or less frequently. Reaction to summaries of the views and recommendations of others will be a factor in making this decision.

Individual initiative and the random approach----so extremely important in scientific discovery----will not be hampered by the work of the coordinating center or the 299 others who, with yourself, participate in the project. We anticipate results of world importance within a few years after initiation of this most valuable work in social research.

To facilitate reproduction of your correspondence in various forms, which is a necessary part of the project method, we ask your permission to make photocopies of, or to print, your comments and recommendations as the project proceeds.

Sincerely yours,

D M Morandini

JANE MORGAN

Citizens Toast An American Gal in Paris

An old adage, "50 Million Frenchmen Can't Be Wrong," was proven correct when a New England-born girl, who in the last four years became the toast of France, returned to America to sing. The lend-lease lovely is Jane Morgan who now has her own new singing program, "The Girl from Paris," on NBC radio Sundays (2:45-3:00 p.m., EST, starting Feb. 4).

Jane was born on May 3, 1926, in Boston, Mass., the daughter of Bertram and Olga Morgan. Her father was a cellist with the Boston Opera Co., as well as an excellent violinist, pianist and composer. Her mother had received her musical education in Europe, but had abandoned her dream of a career as a concert singer to bring up five children.

Jane, being the youngest, profited in her very early years from the instruction her older brothers and sister had already received in the arts. Her childhood was spent studying singing, dancing, piano and dramatics. Lessons were convenient, for the family had formed a school -- her mother giving courses in piano and voice, her father struggling with pupils of the violin and cello, a brother teaching elocution and dramatics, and her sister teaching modern dance.

High school days were spent singing over local radio stations. Upon leaving school and still following her mother's designs, she enrolled at the Juilliard School of Music in New York City in 1943. It was three years of Debussy, Verdi and Brahms in the daytime and singing popular songs with small bands at night. In 1946 she abandoned opera to sing with the Dick Stabile Orchestra.

While with the band she was approached by a gentleman with a French accent, who asked her if she spoke French. She said no. He said that was fine because he wanted to take an American girl who didn't speak French over to Paris to work in an elegant night club. Miss Morgan at first laughed off the offer, believing it a gag. The man was so persistent Jane checked up on him and found he was Bernard Hilda, a well-known French orchestra leader.

Thinking this would be a good chance to see Europe for a few months, she signed a contract -- putting in a special clause to provide her with three substantial meals a day, as well as her salary, having heard of the scarcity of food overseas.

In a matter of weeks she found herself installed in the Club Champs Elysees, in the shadow of the Eiffel Tower, singing American songs to a predominantly French audience. Jane Morgan soon became the toast of France and developed a flawless Paris accent. Before long she was putting American songs into torchy French. The few months stretched into four years and engagements all over the continent of Europe.

Offers started pouring in for bookings in the U.S. for this blue-eyed, attractive blonde who could sing the Gallic version of American songs, and vice-versa. Miss Morgan continually turned them down until an American booker, in Paris to find a French chanteuse, was able to sign her up. The booker lined up many top-spot engagements in America for his new "French" discovery. He was quite amazed at her perfect English, until Jane -- after signing her contract -- told the amazed agent his new "French" discovery was born and raised in New England.

Jane is five feet six inches tall, and weighs 125 pounds. She is single mainly because she can't find time for romance. Her spare time is spent studying tap dancing and ballet, taking voice lessons, learning to speak Italian, and working with a writer-composer on her special songs. Any extra time beyond that she devotes to memorizing new tunes and keeping her array of Paris and New York gowns in spotless condition (she has no personal maid, though Mama helps now and then). So, for the time being, Jane just sings about romance.

I am a senior at Princeton University doing my thesis on radio and television news reporting, especially the reporting of political news. At your convenience, I would like to talk to you about this subject. More specifically, my topic concerns the content of news broadcasts, the gathering of news, method of reporting, and the limitations of news broadcasting. While I have already talked to some network officials, it is most important to me that I receive your ideas.

If you can see me for a half-hour or so anytime, anywhere between January twenty-seventh and February seventh, I would deeply appreciate it. Should this be inconvenient for you, merely inform me when you plan to have a free moment between now and then.

Dear Dr. Morrill:

Very many thanks for your cordial letter of July 10th.

I am greatly honored by your invitation to deliver a lecture in the Gideon Seymour Memorial Lecture Series during the academic year 1959-60.

I regret very much that I must decline your kind invitation since I shall be out of the country for most of the coming year. I have decided that the time has come for me to try to learn a little more rather than talk and I propose to use my sabbatical leave for this purpose.

Thank you again for asking me.

OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT

July 10, 1959

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
c/o Columbia Broadcasting System
485 Madison Avenue
New York, N. Y.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

This letter is to extend to you the friendliest and warmest invitation that I can convey to be a guest of the University of Minnesota and deliver a lecture in the Gideon Seymour Memorial Lecture Series during the academic year 1959-60. I am aware that you are on leave, enjoying a kind of sabbatical, but this very fact encourages us to hope that your calendar is a bit more flexible and that you would be able to come to Minneapolis on some date of your own choosing. In a general way we might hope that if you can accept our invitation it would be for the late fall or early winter of 1959-60; but we are so anxious to have you as our honored guest that we would, of course, do anything possible to adapt our own program to fit your schedule.

This invitation has, at least for us and we hope for you, more than usual significance and it is made possible by a generous fund given to the University of Minnesota to honor the memory of a distinguished Minneapolis journalist who was nationally and internationally known. Mr. Gideon Seymour, in whose name the lectureship was established, was a man of wide interests, and the donors of the memorial have expressed their desire that this be reflected in the speakers who are chosen under the grant. There is no thought, accordingly, that the subject must relate to journalism or to the field of public information. Quite to the contrary, it is desired and intended that there will be discussions in the arts, the field of literature, and music, as well as in the field of public affairs. In your own case we would very much hope that you might select a lecture subject bearing upon the general question of the responsibilities of the mass communication agencies in our modern society. The exact subject and your treatment of it, of course, would be left entirely to your own wishes and interests.

Under the grant we would provide an over-all honorarium of $2000.00. As I am sure you know, Minneapolis has comfortable and convenient direct airplane service from New York and excellent non-stop flights take only a little more than three hours.

It has been our custom to present the Seymour lectures on Sunday afternoons in Northrop Memorial Auditorium on our campus. While we are not bound to a Sunday date, we do find that this makes it possible for citizens from a wide area in the state to come to Minneapolis to hear our speakers--and they do come in large numbers indeed.

The lecture series in which we hope you will participate has been endowed by the Minneapolis Star and Tribune, Mr. Cowles' newspapers, of wide circulation in this Upper Midwest region of the United States. Mr. Seymour was the executive editor of these newspapers. As a means of carrying these lectures to a broader audience than those in actual attendance, the University of Minnesota, through its University Press, has published each lecture in the past and these have had very wide distribution. We would desire the privilege of publication should you be able to be our guest.

Our invitation to you is supported unanimously by an Advisory Committee of fourteen members, all of them distinguished citizens of the state of Minnesota, including Mr. John Cowles, Dr. Charles W. Mayo of the Mayo Clinic, President L. M. Gould of Carleton College, Mrs. Margaret Culkin Banning, and others. When the series was inaugurated, the first speaker was a personal friend of Mr. Seymour, Mr. James Reston of the New York Times; and others who have followed in the series are Dr. Arnold Toynbee, Mr. T. S. Eliot, Dr. James B. Conant, Mr. Walter Lippmann, Mr. Lester B. Pearson, Dr. Harrison Brown, Mr. Archibald MacLeish, and more recently His Highness, the Governor of Mysore.

It is not necessary for me to tell you anything about the University of Minnesota for I know you are familiar with its achievements in scholarship and science and are aware of its outstanding support of literature and the arts generally. There are many of my colleagues here, including our mutual friend, Dean E. W. Ziebarth of our Summer Session, who would regard it as a great privilege to have you on our campus.

I should be very happy to supply any additional information to you if desired. We shall be honored and grateful indeed if it is possible for you to accept this invitation, and I can assure you of an enthusiastic audience and a most hearty welcome.

Sincerely,

J. L. Morrill

Dear Mr. Murrow:

I thought perhaps you'd be interested in learning that the Board of Education has begun a new television series called NEWSWORTHY.

Last week the topics were the Brussels Fair and U. S. participation in International Trade Fairs.

Our second program in the series will be seen Thursday, April 24, 11:00-11:30 A.M. on WPIX, Channel 11. The topic will be Atomic Energy -- Its Destructive Use. The series runs through May 29.

With a staff of two and a budget of $15.00 per program we've our backs to the wall -- but enjoying it. Your comments would be sincerely appreciated.

Many thanks, again, for your interest.

I am writing you at the suggestion of Otto Zausmer of The Boston Globe. He tells me that he has made arrangements to carry stories written by your son on his schooling in various countries during the period of your sabbatical.

The Globe, of course, is a member of the Alliance, but Otto tells me that he would prefer that I deal directly with you on this matter.

We would be most interested in distributing your son's stories to our more than 100 outstanding newspapers here and abroad. I am not clear on how often he will be writing these reports, but we would pay him $25 for each story.

You may recall that I wrote you about the possibility of your doing some articles for us. I understand your desire not to get tied up in this sort of thing during a precious opportunity for reflection and reading. But I am pleased at the prospect of working with another Murrow on his baptism in reporting.

I look forward to hearing from you, or Casey, soon and affirmatively.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

As a newspaperman, I read with some distress of your decision to take a leave of absence from television. I believe the standards you have set there offer a challenge to us all.

This morning's Times says you hope to "engage in leisurely travel, reading and contemplation." It's my hope that you might find some time for writing, too.

The North American Newspaper Alliance, as you may know, is a leading news-feature agency which is distributed to more than 100 top newspapers around the world, including The New York Times, London Express, London Telegraph, Washington Star, Baltimore Sun, San Francisco Chronicle, Kansas City Star, Milwaukee Journal, Atlanta Journal & Constitution, and so forth.

A major function of our service is to supply subscribers with outstanding features by figures of importance. Thus, in the last year we have distributed the series by Gov. Adlai Stevenson on his trip to the Soviet Union, monthly articles on issues in the cold war by former President Truman, and single stories by such important U.S. politicians as Senators Kennedy, Douglas and Keating. At the same time, we were responsible for the series on Red China on which Gerald Clark based his prize-winning CBS production, "The Face of Red China."

This is all in line with a NANA tradition dating back to the days when Ernest Hemingway covered the Spanish Civil War for us--and earlier--when we published General Pershing's memoirs.

I hope that you will consider the possibility of doing some stories for NANA. You would be free of deadline obligations and we would consider any proposal you may have in mind. We have long been interested in this prospect, but it seems to me that --for the first time--your schedule may allow you to think about it.

I would be glad to talk about this with you at your convenience.

Sincerely,

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Professor Dexter Perkins wrote you on March 3rd and tried to see on Friday the 6th but was told that you were not available. He is now on his way to the west coast and asked me to write you.

Under separate cover I am sending you our most recent brochure, which will provide you with any background information you may need about the Seminar. We hope very much that you will be able to accept this invitation to teach at the Salzburg Seminar from February 12th to March 12th, 1960 and feel sure that it will be the stimulating experience for you that it has been for all the other faculty members.

The students average thirty years with a minimum age of twenty-five. They are all selected from jobs of communication and in your case would probably be important people from the radio and television industry from all of the fifteen countries of Western Europe. It would involve giving twelve lectures to the entire student body of sixty men and women, which would include people interested in American journalism and American literature, and conducting eight round table seminars with the twelve or fifteen people with special interest in radio and television broadcasting.

We make a travel allowance for you and provide room and lodging for you and your wife while you are at the Seminar.

This brief summary plus the brochure will give you something of the flavor of the enterprise. You may have a number of questions. Of course, we will be very happy to answer these either by mail or by personal conversation.

Dear Mr. Murrow,

As a radio-television listener-viewer as well as a member of the business, I should like to express my sorrow at the news of your leaving the field for a year this summer. But moreso as a fellow newsman-broadcaster, I can certainly appreciate your need for a vacation, whether or not the rumored friction is a contributing factor in your decision.

The releases said you wished to "spend a year... listening, reading and trying to learn..." I wonder if I could appeal to you, if you can spare the time, to give some thought to the question of the so-called "flying saucers."

Unidentified flying objects have, in the past 12 years, become the subject of a burgeoning field of interest, ranging all the way from some of the most incongruous and spurious crackpots, through the world's most respected scientists, many prominent military men, politicians, business people, and plain citizens. In the past two years, both as a newsman and a follower for many years of the subject, I have noted a rapid growth in interest among reporters, writers, and other wielders of public opinion.

The field has undoubtedly been hampered in its cry for official recognition, by the many fanatics and lunatics present among its boundaries...of these we have tried desperately and apparently unsuccessfully to rid ourselves. I feel most sincerely that any capable investigator-researcher who takes the time to study the basic facts and ample evidence to back up the existence of some unusual objects in our skies which defy rational explanation in many cases, must come to the conclusion that there is something most unique there, and further that our government is behaving most monstrously in its misguided and inconsistent handling of the situation.

I would consider it an honor to put any available further information in your hands, or to arrange a meeting or series of briefings for you, among several respected experts, and at your convenience.

Should I be able to give you any assistance in this line, please do not hesitate to call upon me. My private address is Beechwood Drive, Morristown; phone JEfferson 8-6995.

In the meantime, I should like to offer my best wishes for a restful and fruitful leave. We will look for your return.

Very truly yours,

Dear Mrs. Murrow:

Each year the Greensboro Daily News woman's department asks well-known North Carolinian women (and Tar Heel wives, too) to contribute to Recipe for a Carolina Christmas. Each day beginning Sunday after Thanksgiving, a woman of interest to North Carolina gives her family's favorite Christmas recipe and perhaps a few words about the family Christmas plans and the recipe's history.

We are hoping you will contribute this year, joining the wife of Gov. Luther Hodges, Mrs. Robert Ruark, Mrs. Carl Sandburg and many other famous Tar Heel women. Even if you don't cook, someone in your household does. If you have an old and treasured family recipe, so much the better---truly, we have more fruitcake recipes than does Fanny Farmer! Your never-fail holiday entertainment formula is equally welcome.

In addition to your recipe, we would like a photo or snapshot suitable for publication, and please give us your full name---given name, maiden surname and your home town. This will be used in no commercial way and is always presented in good taste. I am enclosing an envelope for your convenience. Incidentally, could you please clear up the bicker concerning Mr. Murrow's birthplace----several assorted townships etc. insist upon claiming him.

Good luck in your Mount Holyoke work, and in advance, a happy, happy Christmas to you both and to Casey. I hope this is not too great an intrusion into your year of rest. If you reply favorably, do you think readers would be interested in your Christmas in London during the Blitz?

OVERPOPULATION and Catholic Doctrine

God would not make a world in which men would outstrip living resources because they obey His and nature's command

REV. ANTHONY ZIMMERMAN, S.V.D., S.T.D.

A JAPANESE non-Christian once made an observation about the Sixth Commandment which I shall never forget. It happened one afternoon at St. Hedwig's Parish, Nagoya, during a lecture on Christianity before a group of medical students from Nagoya University. I suggested during the talk, perhaps impertinently, that the Sixth Commandment must frighten many Japanese and prevent their joining the Catholic Church. Japan's campaign for birth control was still at its height at that time. One of the students answered as follows, apparently with the approval of all: "Indeed, your judgment is correct, but you must not exaggerate. That same commandment attracts many of us just because of its austere demands, and its great spiritual beauty."

Father Zimmerman worked as a missionary in Japan during 1948-52. Returning to the United States he specialized in studies on overpopulation problems at the Catholic University of America. His doctoral dissertation on the subject ("Overpopulation. A Study of Papal Teachings on the Problem, with Special Reference to Japan," Washington: Catholic University Press, 1958, 325 pages, $4.00) is gaining ever wider recognition in theological and sociological circles here and abroad. Father Zimmerman taught Moral Theology at St. Mary's Seminary, Techny, Illinois, during the past three years. He will return to Japan in April to teach at the Divine Word Seminary which is affiliated with the S.V.D. Catholic University of Nagoya. This is the first in a series of articles.

Prime Minister Nehru complained recently at the Planned Parenthood Congress in India, that the eight year government-sponsored birth control program had produced only meager results. He said that general laughter, amusement, and shyness greeted birth control promoters throughout rural India. The entire campaign, with its posters, training films, radio programs, mobile health vans, 800 rural clinics, had all proved disappointing. The vast majority of India's peasants, he continued, believe that children are a gift of God; they say that anyone who tampers with childbirth is defying God's will. At the close of the meeting, Nehru launched a program with more generous subsidies to ensure better success. State hospitals offer free sterilization operations, and some offer cash premiums to cooperators. The Prime Minister had long hesitated about planned parenthood before this, perhaps remembering that Gandhi had once called contraception "mutual masturbation."

A fellow missionary told this story about an Indian village, which makes one wonder how long it will take before the people accept family planning through contraception. A government sanitation team arrived to test for tuberculosis and fight diseases. Painted on the side of the team's truck were the letters "B.C." Upon seeing this, a flurry of excitement buzzed through the village, and soon an angry mob descended upon the hapless pair, bent upon beating them and burning the truck. Only with difficulty did the astonished pair get word through that the letters stood for "Bacteria Control," not "Birth Control." Appeased, the villagers desisted from further violence, and returned to their occupations. If voluntary birth control arouses such opposition, compulsory programs would be dangerous experiments.

A survey made in Japan during 1954 indicated that the government-sponsored birth control program had gained the cooperation of 33% of the couples approached; 59% were not cooperating; and eight per cent failed to answer. Among those who practiced birth control, 20% answered that they were relying entirely upon the "rhythm" method. This may come as a surprise, since rhythm is a hard discipline even for Christians, and since many employers furnish free birth prevention and abortion services to Japanese woman employees. In the meantime birth control has spread to the majority of Japanese fertile couples, according to a more recent survey, but rhythm (Continued on page 13)

Communism and Youth

Beginning in this issue (see page 11) and continuing through November, Father Conroy presents a special thorough and timely discussion on "Communism looks at youth."

GOD LOVE YOU

Most Reverend

Fulton J. Sheen

Is there enough faith and is the spirit of sacrifice enough in your parish to have adoration of Our Lord in the Blessed Sacrament night and day? Are there too many ill, too many hardships in daily life, to ask a thousand people to answer the question of Our Lord in the Garden: "Can you not watch One Hour with Me?" Are there many who work hard, and who need their sleep so much, that it would be asking too much of them to make that sacrifice for the sins of the world?

Well, there is a peper colony in Korea with fewer souls in it than there are in your parish, and there is Perpetual Adoration of Our Eucharistic Lord night and day. Every hour the lepers recite the rosary for those who aid in the Propagating of the Faith throughout the mission world. Their church was made from abandoned war materials, and is shaped like an egg shell, but in it the Lord of Heaven and earth makes His abode. Gathered about Him are hundreds of lepers with running sores, arms without hands and faces that never dare look in a mirror — but souls that already glow with the radiance of eternity.

Sacrifice? We have not begun to understand the meaning of the cross. Maybe the example of these lepers will, please God, accomplish two things: 1. inspire priests to have perpetual adoration in their parishes; 2. move those who have many sins on their souls to make sacrifices for these lepers, that their pure souls may pray for them. The Holy Father knows there are ten million lepers in the world; he knows all the colonies which need aid. Allow him to decide where your sacrifices should go.

GOD LOVE YOU to Miss A. H. B. for $10. "I have made a Novena of Masses for the intention that I will learn what my vocation is. That is the prayer, and here is the sacrifice." . . . to O. D. K. for $100. "I am promising $1,000 to Our Holy Father for the Missions and this is the first installment. I am making this sacrifice for a special intention — that my brother will obtain the grace to overcome the habit of drinking and come home — for which I and several members of my family have been praying for several years." . . to R. H. V. for $15.50. "This was saved for a pair of shoes or a dress; instead, I am sending it to you for the Propagation of the Faith with the hope of obtaining a very special favor." . . to Mrs. C. M. for $18.75. "I am cashing one of my bonds to be used for the Society for the Propagation of the Faith." . . . to Miss P. W. for $3. "I became ashamed when I discovered my younger brother sends you a dollar every now and then, when he doesn't even have a job. Here is a small part of my weekly pay."

Each decade of beads on the WORLDMISSION ROSARY comes in a different color: green, red, white, blue, and yellow. This is to remind you to pray for the missions on each of the five continents. For your offering of $2 and your request we will send you this WOLDRMISSION ROSARY blessed by Bishop Sheen.

Cut out this column, pin your sacrifice to it and mail it to Most Rev. Fulton J. Sheen, National Director of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith, 366 Fifth Avenue, New York 1x, N. Y. or your Diocesan Director.

Are these also our brothers?

The eighth in a series of articles by Father Cronin, who is assistant director of the Social Action Department of the National Catholic Welfare Conference.

Race problem will be solved by Americans' moral conscience, not by legal action alone

REV. JOHN F. CRONIN, S.S.

THE sensitive Christian, seeking to mold society in accord with the truths of the Gospel, must confront the race problem. If he lives in the South, the immediate issue is integration in the schools. If he lives in the North, his concern centers about housing and jobs for minority groups. But wherever he lives, the really critical problem is that of attitude toward our colored brothers in Christ.

There should be no problem of attitude. In the words of the American bishops, "Our Christian faith is of its nature universal. It knows not the distinctions of race, color, or nationhood. . . The love of Christ, and the love of the Christian, knows no bounds." Our faith teaches that Christ died for all men, that we are brothers under an Eternal Father, that we are all called to be members of Christ's mystical body, the Church.

The Gospels, the Epistles, and solemn statements of Pope Pius XII and Pope John XXIII—all affirm the truth of the unity of the human race. These popes, the bishops of the United States, and the bishops of South Africa have explicitly affirmed that racism is evil and un-Christian. Our bishops are quite definite in noting that enforced legal segregation "by its very nature imposes a stigma of inferiority upon the segregated people." For this reason, and because of the evil fruits of segregation, they conclude that enforced segregation cannot be reconciled with the Christian view of our fellow man.

To many Catholics these are "hard sayings." It is well known that certain among us have explicitly rejected Church teaching on this subject. Others remain silent, but they are hurt and puzzled. They cannot reconcile the views of the Church with attitudes that they have held since childhood. Some say that the popes and the bishops do not understand the problem. They do not have to live with it.

This reaction is not new. When Our Lord first preached the doctrine of the Eucharist, some found it hard to believe and followed Him no longer. God's law on the permanence of marriage can be a grievous burden to separated Catholic spouses. Many cannot take it and remarry, thus losing access to the sacraments. Those who would follow a crucified Savior must be prepared to carry their own crosses. Some rebel.

Confronted with this problem, a kindly pastor of souls does not aggravate the situation by seeking to impose blind obedience. He tries to nourish the flickering flame of good will by sympathetic explanation of the will of God. He shows understanding of the anguish felt by the troubled soul. While he cannot compromise on God's law, he can make every effort to secure willing acceptance rather than cold and enforced obedience.

Catholics should take this same pastoral attitude when racial problems are discussed. They should seek to understand the complexity of the situation, its personal and historical roots, and the difficulties involved in modifying lifelong convictions or even prejudices.

GENERALLY speaking, the Catholic who balks at racial equality is not ill disposed toward the Negro as a person. On the contrary, he is probably kind in his personal contacts. He is a good employer. He may be most helpful when sickness or tragedy strikes a colored family that he knows. He can say with sincere conviction that his attitude is one of Christian charity.

But, for various reasons, he balks at the concept of equality. He will gladly offer the kindness of a gracious superior toward an inferior. But he rejects the parity implied in a non-segregated society. He asserts that this is unrealistic, since Negroes he knows are culturally inferior to whites. He considers the Negro community to be demoralized. He does not want this contagion to affect his children and his neighborhood. Let the Negro progress in education, in economic status, and in culture, but let him do this separately. Perhaps when this process is completed, the question of equality can then be discussed realistically.

The tragedy in this thinking is that the process may never be completed in a segregated society. When an entire social structure stigmatizes a race as inferior, it is virtually impossible for that race to rise to higher levels. There are many reasons why this is so. (Continued on page 14)

Nature's own objection against contraception can hardly be described as an obstreperous shouting. Her voice is low and gentle; one must bend a willing ear to understand her veto. Those who choose to disobey generally escape without evident and immediate catastrophe. God has added strength to nature's voice through the Bible and the Teaching Church. Dramatically He demonstrated how offensive the sin of Onan was to Him, by striking the culprit with instant death (Gen. 38, 10). Christian leaders who lead mankind astray on this point perform a disservice. For little does it profit a man to be cajolled into error, only to find himself excluded forever from the circle of God's family. How then can teachings of Christianity be reconciled with overpopulation problems?

POPE PIUS XII often called attention to the fact that Christian virtue grows with difficulty amidst adverse living conditions. "The normal growth and increase of religious life," he said, "presuppose a certain measure of healthy economic conditions. Who can resist a pang of emotion upon seeing how economic misery and social evils render Christian life according to the commands of God more difficult and too often demand heroic sacrifices?" Catholics must therefore profess to be very much opposed to conditions of overpopulation, in which the scarcity of living resources no longer allows humans to live in dignity.

Has the Catholic Church perhaps walked into a dilemma, an inescapable choice between permitting birth control and thereby offending God, or forbidding it and thereby wronging man? One non-Catholic writer has given brotherly advice that the Church ought to surrender to contraception; else she will lose the respect of reasoning men and dwindle into a twilight of insignificance after so many years of glory. Alvah Sulloway wrote that "the Catholic Church is the one so far insuperable obstacle to the solution of the world's population problems. In a reversal of its attitude may hang the survival of our own society." Sincere inquirers are puzzled and repelled by what appears to be an unreasonable opposition against contraception. Our answer will hardly penetrate to the heart unless it first satisfies the mind.

Christians will be inclined to make short work of arguments about overpopulation by appealing to Divine Providence. God would not have made a world with a built-in contradiction, they can argue. He must have looked into the future when He released an expanding human race upon a globe with final limitations. A thousand years are as one day in His sight. All things are present to Him simultaneously, whereas they stream past us as present, past, and future. He could not have fashioned a world in which men would outstrip living resources because they obey His and nature's command to procreate.

They may supplement the argument by pointing to the mighty universe, plastic image of God's immensity. Nowhere is there a sign of niggardliness, of a close fit between requirements and supplies. All creation is characterized by bounteous munificence, by a plenty which seems almost lavish. Why, for example, did God create so many stars, such boundless depths of space? Why the oversupply of seeds for trees and grasses? The earth is stocked with fabulous pools of oil, with inverted mountains of ore.

God seems to have been little concerned about ever running out of food supplies for man. Why, for example, did He create song birds instead of capons? Why so much ocean, such lonely deserts, majestic mountains, and endless tundra wildernesses, when He could have made more farm land instead? Why did He command man to rest from labor once a week, thus lowering food production?

Christ even said that we shouldn't be overly anxious about food:

"I say to you, then, do not fret over your life, how to support it with food and drink, . . . It is for the heathen to busy themselves over such things; you have a Father in heaven who knows that you need them all. Make it your first care to find the kingdom of God, and his approval, and all these things shall be yours without the asking. Do not fret, then, over to-morrow; leave to-morrow to fret over its own needs; for to-day, to-day's troubles are enough" (Matt. 6, 25; 32-34).

The words of Cardinal Siri addressed to the Italian Catholic Social Week Convention at Palermo are apropos: "We do not know, and we cannot pretend to know, how God intends to maintain a balance between the population of the world and its resources; we know, however, that such a point of equilibrium must certainly exist in every eventuality, because as surely as God exists and is perfect, so surely must His works also be perfect."

We will not appeal to this argument based on Divine Providence in the rest of this series precisely because some claim that Divine Providence also includes birth control. We will use the findings of science instead, especially the statistics which have been made available by the United Nations and affiliated agencies. They show, I believe, that the so-called "population explosion" will be a very temporary affair, destined to stop with or without birth control; there will be plenty of space on earth after the explosion dies away in its echoes. Furthermore, living conditions are not going from bad to worse as is often claimed, but quite to the contrary, and the population increase is really helping in that direction.

Attack on the family

5. In the ancient pagan world, polytheism naturally led to excesses which could not have been possible under a true religion. These excesses naturally disgusted more intelligent and reasonable people, like Plato. He specified in his "Republic" that the antics of the gods, those excesses of human imagination should be censored from the education to be given the young of his ideal state, to make good citizens. There was no respect for religion left among the people. What was left was firmly entrenched in the religion of the hearth. The effective religious influence at the time of the greatest cultural achievement of Greece and Rome was to be found only in the home. Also in Confucianism, which is not much else than naturalism, the principal religious influence is found in ancestor worship.

All of this shows that religion is a necessary part of the family. There can be no sound family institution unless religion is an essential ingredient. The Son of God chose to bring His true religion into the world by becoming a member of a family. We can be sure that the foster-father, St. Joseph, and the Blessed Mother of the Son of God made religion the most basic part of their family establishment. It is not too surprising to find that Jesus gave wise answers to the doctors of the law at the age of 12, because He was steeped in the Law in His home environment.

But modern civilization, which prides itself in complete secularization, has destroyed effectively this basic characteristic of the family as a fundamental social unit, and thus has secularized its age. If the Communists in Russia would have continued their attitude toward religion with which they started in 1918, religion would have been completely eradicated there by this time. The only reason religion has survived to the extent that it has, is because it is so deeply engrained in the family spirit of traditional Russia. In this country, social attitudes which result from our way of life are effectively destroying religion. We call ourselves a religious nation and yet more than half of the people claim no active religious affiliation.

HERE are five fairly probable signs of spiritual progress, and none of them so far above our heads as to be unpractical for the lowest of us.

(1) To be discontinued with our present state.

(2) To be constantly making new beginnings and fresh starts.

(3) To be trying to overcome some definite fault, or acquire some definite virtue.

(4) It is a still greater sign that we are making progress if we have a strong feeling in our minds that God wants something particular from us.

(5) An increased general desire of being more perfect is not altogether without its value as a sign of progress.

If we have one of these signs, it is well; if two, better; if three, better still; if four, capital; if five, glorious. — Father Faber in My Daily Visitor

I CAN FINISH THE WORK

In the village of MATOOR, "THE FUND FOR THE NEW CHURCH was raised in several ways. Every house kept a pot into which the family each day put a bit of rice. Every week this was collected. At harvest time we collected pepper, coconut and bananas from each family. In FOUR YEARS we raised a fund of $4,000. Following the agitation against the Communist Government of Kerala we spent the balance of the church construction-fund TO SUPPORT THE FAMILIES OF THE DEAD AND INJURED, TO GIVE MEDICAL HELP, TO FEED THOSE IN PRISON. Our people lost work and wages for fifty days." Following this unadorned story of generosity, suffering and charity, FATHER JACOB, the vicar of THE PARISH OF ST. ANTHONY, writes, "I CAN FINISH THE WORK IF I GET A HELP OF $1,500." To think that in the midst of this want and suffering only $1,500 IS NEEDED to finish the church. Father Jacob and his people will appreciate YOUR IMITATION OF THEIR CHARITY.

Are these also our brothers?

(Continued from page 2) The most fundamental is that it is difficult to acquire a sense of human dignity when one is being treated constantly as less than fully human. When rights are being denied to a Negro community, how can it be expected to assert these same rights in its own internal affairs?

The segregationist argues that among Negroes there is little respect for property, for sexual continence, or even for human life. And he will cite statistics to prove his point. But he fails to see that the vices of certain Negroes are direct products of a segregated society. If some steal, or are incontinent, or are violent in venting their anger, are they acting differently than whites would act under similar conditions? That question can be answered by reading accounts of behavior in concentration camps and prisoner-of-war camps. Far too many products of our so-called superior white culture succumbed when treated barbarously.

A common stereotype of the Negro is that he is shiftless and lazy. Yet when some white Americans visit their ancestral lands, they are often shocked to find that their compatriots are often very unprogressive. If they are understanding, they may realize that poverty of soil and lack of opportunity may kill initiative. Poor diet and elementary medical care may so weaken bodies that hard work is almost impossible.

Many Negroes suffer from similar disabilities. Their education is inferior or even nonexistent. Even where opportunity for education exists, there may be no incentive to accept it. The educated Negro, who cannot find a job in which he can use his talents, suffers even more than the Negro who gave up early. He is condemned to frustration and rebellion.

Thus the vicious and demoralizing circle goes on. Escape from it is extraordinarily difficult. The ambitious Negro farm boy in the South may find a little more opportunity in the city, but this is counterbalanced by crowded slum conditions. If he moves to a Northern city, again his fate may be slums and inferior jobs. He is often segregated factually, if not legally.

THERE are two ways to break this vicious circle. One is to fight one's way out by using every legal and economic weapon available for the purpose of securing justice. Court actions can be taken to strike down laws imposing segregation. Boycotts can win fair treatment in buses. Laws and persuasion can break down discrimination in jobs.

The path of justice under the law is frequently used today. It is thoroughly legitimate, but it suffers from certain limitations. It tends to enhance frictions and increase prejudice. Certainly its use in the South, at least in the short range, has caused racial relations to deteriorate. The same is true in some Northern cities, especially where housing is involved.

These by-products can be avoided if justice is complemented by Christian love of neighbor. As Pope Pius XI observed, "justice alone can never bring about union of minds and hearts." Without this bond, "the best of regulations can come to naught, as we have learned by too frequent experience." The race problem will be solved by the moral conscience of the American people, and not by legal action alone.

Before we consider any question of techniques or methods, we must face up to one basic problem of attitude. We must ask ourselves one critical question: Are we as Christians willing and eager to help our fellow man who is of a different race? Let us for the moment leave aside questions of integration or segregation, of cultural inferiority or superiority. The fundamental issue is our willingness to help our colored brethren to live a better life, both spiritually and materially.

If we want them to be better off, much better off, than they are today, then we are viewing the problem with a Christian attitude. If we are willing to do something personally, as our opportunities permit, we are ready to put this Christian attitude into practice. At this stage the biggest hurdle in the struggle toward fair treatment of a different race has been passed.

The Christian who makes this affirmation is like the soul that is seeking to be generous in the service of God. The first offer of love and total dedication to the Lord is a tremendous step. It is not final or irrevocable. There can be failures and moments of discouragement, But such a soul is on the right path.

It is in this spirit that we must face the race problem. We must stand on Calvary and there realize that Christ is dying for all mankind. If our hearts can absorb something of this love, our minds can then take up the question of methods and techniques. These points will be discussed in the article to follow.

THOUGHTS

From the writings of Fr. James Keller, M.M.

When elegant carriages clattered over New York's cobblestone streets, immigrant families were crowded into dark, cold-water walk-ups.

One day, a little girl from one of the wealthy families went with her cousin to "visit the poor." The sight of 7-and-8-year-olds nearly starving, so crippled by rickets they could only crawl, left a lasting impression on this little girl.

Because of her determination to do something practical to correct it, the little girl eventually went to medical school with the sole intention of preparing herself to do social work with professional skill. She became Doctor Eleanor A. Campbell, founder and director of the Judson Health Center, which has helped millions of diseased children through the years.

You will do great things for the afflicted once you see Christ Himself in each of them. You will be fired by a purpose which can come from no other source.

"Amen, I say to you, as long as you did it not to one of these least, neither did you do it to me." (Matthew 25:45)

Father Conroy talks to youth

Communism looks at youth

(First in a series)

IF YOU WERE A COMMUNIST

IT is my conviction that our American youth as a group do not know what Communism is, what it stands for and what its objectives are.

This is not an idle statement. During the course of an average school year I meet thousands of our youth from coast to coast. I see and talk with them at retreats, youth conventions and similar occasions. This is to say nothing of the many more who read this column and with whom I am in constant correspondence.

I have taken the pains on numerous occasions to query many of these young people on the nature and objectives of Communism.

I am appalled at their ignorance of the subject. To be sure they know that it's causing a lot of trouble in the world. They know about the Hungarian freedom riots — and now of course everyone knows that Khrushchev has been here. So they can say they have actually seen a communist (TV, of course.)

DIE IN ITS TRACKS

But this is all a far-away-thing with them. It's a sort of nether-world which exists, but you can't see into it or beyond it. And really, since it's bad, it will never get anywhere. Also, it seems to be indentified with foreign lands, or with foreigners, and if it hit the United States of America it would die right in its tracks.

As one youth remarked to me, "The Russians just don't know what a good time is. . ."

Some of our youth are better read on the subject. They know it's atheistic. They know that if it isn't stopped it will take over in the U.S. They can even recognize signs of its influence here and there.

But even these young people — those who are most aware of Communism — are not sure of what they can do about it, or that they just do anything about it. In their minds it's a fight for adults — Church leaders, labor chiefs, statesmen, politicians, the FBI and certain congressional committees investigating subversion.

These are the people who meet it day in and day out — and they will take care of things.

They'd better too! It's their (the adult experts') responsibility to keep tab on the movement. And with that — it's back to good ol' earth again — studies, school organizations, dances, parties and "whose dating who!!"

Well, we wish it could be that way. We wish our young people could go on enjoying themselves. We wish Communism and communists were as far away as they were thought to be.

ADULTS ONLY

But it just isn't so, unfortunately. Little do our youth realize that everything they think, everything they do is a matter of great interest to the communist party.

Place yourselves, for a moment in the position of anyone planning to take over your country, your government — and that's what the Communists are planning. Whom would you be interested in if your movement was to have lasting and long range effect? The adults only? Perhaps for a time.

If you were wise you would look at the youth of the country, for the future of any country will someday be in the hands of these who are now its youth.

You would concern yourselves with youth, the young, because they are impressionable. They are idealistic, possessed of countless dreams, hopes and a longing for the golden future. You would take advantage of all this and play it to the hilt.

GIVE THEM A CAUSE

You would give youth a "cause," something for which to fight and die. You would present that "cause" with verve and fervor.

You would also understand that in the young there is a certain tendency toward rebellion against authority, to flaunt traditions and to gravitate toward those who tell them they "are old enough to make up their own minds. . ." You would capitalize on all this, making every effort to wean young people away from their parents, their priests and teachers.

Yes, you would do all these things. So would anyone planning to "take over" a country, its people and government. So, therefore, would the Communists. And they are doing these things.

As J. Edgar Hoover, writing in this column (for January 25, 1959) says: "This brazen and cynical exploitation of the wonderful traits of youth is one of the most vicious aspects of the whole conspiracy to enslave and dominate the world. . .

"Make no mistake about it. Every child in America is an ultimate target of communistic effort in some form or another."

A CONSPIRACY

But no one should get the idea that these maneuvers are easily seen or observed by the casual passerby. As Mr. Hoover says, this is a conspiracy with all that the word connotes. It is designed to deceive, to hoodwink, too. On occasions it works openly, with the outstretched hand of friendship — and, of course, a smile. At other times it goes underground and pursues its diabolical aims in darkness and utter savagery.

One occasion it is a model of virtue and law-abiding propriety. Again, it ignores morality.

On this point Mr. Hoover. in a recent statement on Communism (Communist Illusion and Democratic Reality, September 30, 1959) makes the following observation: "He (the communist) is not bound by any traditional, moral, or ethical scruples. Any action — violent or peaceful, lawful or unlawful, moral or immoral, open or covert — which will promote Communist goals, automatically becomes justified.

"His every tactic is guided by the principle that he is actively at war with the entire non-Communist world and that this conflict is not restricted to the political, social and economic fields, but invades every phase of human endeavor. . ."

These are only some of the reasons why the American people, and particularly, our youth, have not been able to follow the devious activities of the Communist Party.

FOR YOU

These are only some of the reasons why the Communist Party has been able to make such strides among the American people, particularly our youth. It is with this in mind that we have decided to do a series of articles on Communism for youth.

It will be our purpose to bring the plans and objectives of the Communist into as sharp a focus as possible. We will try to make our Catholic youth everywhere deeply aware of what's going on around them.

We think we will have many a surprise for you. You will be amazed at the influences at work on your minds and souls — influences, either directly created by the Communists or those upon which they are able to capitalize.

We do not intend to make this a series of lectures. Rather, it will be an examination of every phase of your religious, cultural, social activities in the light of what the enemy has in mind for you and your soul.

NEWS FOR YOU

Your dances, parties, entertainment, fads and general way of going will come in for notice in a way that you would never have expected. You may think these things are all part of your own business and that no one else has taken any account of them.

I have news for you. Your "way of going" has been closely scrutinized. Your weaknesses and your strength have been carefully estimated. Even now, subtle forces are at work to capture your minds and dictate your future. For reasons already mentioned you have not noticed them. If you will follow this and succeeding articles your eyes will be opened. Incidentally, we will welcome any comment which comes from a class discussion or group study of these articles.

4. Chrism and Cross

CHRISM is an ointment made of olive oil and balm. It becomes the matter of the sacrament of confirmation after it is solemnly blessed by the bishop.

The words in the above illustration are the form of confirmation. The bishop pronounces them while anointing a person on the forehead with chrism in the form of the cross.

On the third finger of his right hand, the bishop wears a large ring. At confirmation and other important ceremonies he wears a mitre on his head. In his hand he carries a staff called a crosier. This staff is like the rod carried by shepherds long ago. It is a reminder that the bishop is the guardian and shepherd of all the souls entrusted to his care. — From Sister Maria Giovanni's teaching cards on Confirmation.

Poems of the week

A moon trip

When night falls and the world is still,
You wonder if you ever will Take a trip way up to the moon,
And whether it will be real soon.
Then you wonder if you find
Moon people who are nice and kind,
Or will the moon bugs eat you up
Because they think you are a pup?

The world

God's arms are around the world,
He hesitates to let it twirl;
He's listening, don't you see,
To His Holy Mother's plea,
While she whispers so lightly,
"Please, keep holding it tightly."

Life's prayer

MY Jesus, my God, my Creator: I pray that I may live my life so that I may be pleasing to Thee. Help me to live day by day in a perfection that is known only to Thy saints. May I forget myself and have You always and everywhere foremost in my mind. May I please work twice as hard in achieving virtue as the devil works in destroying it. If it be Thy holy will may Your grace be my fuel and the virtues of Thy grace be my courage and character to bring lost souls back to Thy miraculous goodness. May my life be lived in harmony with Yours and may my death and eternity be breathed in glorious festival with You and Your wonderful saints. This is my life's prayer.

This week's story

A matter of habit

NO one in Japan leaves the house with a book in his or her hand. No one but a mother sees a bare lunch box. Everything has to be wrapped up. It's the custom.

Silk factories cash in on this custom. A piece of silk, plain or patterned, about sixteen inches square, covers a multitude of things. There are bigger ones, too, those that can cover twenty shoe boxes. These pieces of silk are called furoshikis. They take the place of wrapping paper or old newspapers.

This custom of wrapping things in a furoshiki is ingrained in the average Japanese mind. How deep it goes can be illustrated by a true story.

Peter Oyama is a fine young man, a recent convert to Catholicism. One day last summer, he saw that his house was going to be flooded. Last summer there were floods in many parts of Japan; loss of life and destruction of property were widespread. Unless you've been through a typhoon or seen the results of a flood, you can hardly appreciate what the words mean.

Mr. Oyama knew a lot about typhoons, having been born and raised in Japan. He had heard at first hand about some big typhoons and had experienced lesser typhoons. He also knew that, living only about two hundred yards from the dikes of a river, almost anything could happen. At about three o'clock one morning, something did.

Half a mile below his house, the dike gave way, and the water from the river poured into the rice fields. Everyone had been rather on edge since the newspapers and radio had announced that a typhoon was hitting that section. Mr. Oyama had never seen it blow so hard or rain so heavily as it did that afternoon.

He knew that before long the water would come into his own back yard. Who could tell — maybe some other part of the dike might give way? He could hear excited voices outside: policemen were shouting for people to get out of doors.

Peter had to run for his life, but he wanted to take a little something else along, too. What to take? His eye fell on the Legion of Mary Handbook. He grabbed it.

Even under those circumstances, he reverted to custom. He scooped up a furoshiki, wrapped up the book and out he darted, to find safety on higher land.

Chat of the week

DEATH

FATHER RAY GRIBBIN

NOVEMBER is the month of the dead. All of us know this. All of us know that it is the month during which we pray in a special way for people who have died and not yet gone to heaven.

But most boys and girls do not know much about death. This, of course, is not surprising, since nobody else knows very much about death either. In this matter boys and girls are no worse off than grown-ups.

You see, death is a kind of mystery. There are things we know and things we do not know. We know, for example, that no living thing on earth can last forever. Living things wear out, get sick, and can be destroyed. Plants must die. Animals must die. People must die.

When plants and animals die their chemicals break up and they must stop being plants and animals. But it is different with people. When people die their chemicals break up too, and their bodies stop being human bodies. But people go on being people. They still know who they are. They still know where they are. They still know what is happening to them. They are still the same persons they always were, except that they do not have their bodies any longer.

Now another truly wonderful thing we know is this, that someday people will get their bodies back again! And they will keep them forever.

Clearly, then, the most important thing about death is not that it separates us from our bodies for a while.

That brings us right up to the question, why should there be such a thing as death? The answer is not easy, but I might begin by saying that we have death on earth for the same reason you have examinations in school. You go to school to learn things you need in order to live on earth. You have examinations to see whether or not you have learned. If you have not then you can try harder. But someday, ready or not, you must leave school. There is a last examination.

So it is with life. We live on earth to learn how to love God. We may take lots of little examinations, but some day we must leave the school of life. Death is the final examination. Then we are marked forever, either a success or a failure.

Modern manners...

For altar boys

SERVING Mass is a great privilege. The boys given this honor sometimes are careless about their clothes and do not look as sparkling as they should. Torn trousers may show beneath a cassock, for example, or the cassock itself may be mussed from careless handling. Or the white surplice may not be freshly pressed.

Altar boys should take pride in their appearance and be sure that their hair is neatly combed, their face and hands well scrubbed. If cleanliness is next to Godliness, a boy certainly should look his cleanest when he is serving God.

TO: NEWS COLUMNISTS AND COMMENTATORS

Dear Sir:

Here is your review copy of the Report of the Fifth World Order Study Conference on Christian Responsibility on a Changing Planet.

Newspapers, magazines, religious press, radio and television have widely discussed the Conference held in November in Cleveland. We anticipate intensive interest in this full Report, now being published.

It deals with a broad range of crucial issues considered from a perspective of Christian faith and ethics: the power-struggle and security in a nuclear-space age, world economic development, human rights, and peaceful change. The Conference, composed of highly competent delegates of the churches and councils of churches, spoke only for itself, but it has been said, "it spoke with a mighty voice." As noted on the opening page, views in "this report are not to be regarded as necessarily reflecting the views of the Department of International Affairs...or of the National Council of Churches." However, the General Board of the National Council has called upon its constituency and all Americans to study the full Report to help assure "that reasoned progress may be made by the people of the United States and their government toward solving the serious problems faced by our nation in its foreign relations."

The Report is being distributed primarily for study purposes, to stimulate people to read widely, to think for themselves, and to arrive at their own informed and considered judgments in the light of Christian faith. They are encouraged to act then on the basis of their own convictions.

This Report will be used along with other materials and bibliographical suggestions reflecting various positions on different issues, in the Nationwide Program of Education and Action for Peace, June 1959-June 1960. The Program is sponsored by the Department of International Affairs and denominations of the National Council. The schedule: Conferences during the summer; Training Seminars in every possible state council of churches in September-October and in every possible local council of churches in November-December; programs in every possible local church across the 50 states of the Union from January to June 1960.

We are pleased to send this Report to you for your information and use. If we can be of further service, please let us know.

Sincerely yours,

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Word has just reached me by telephone through our Broadcasting and Film Commission that you will be unable to participate in the consultation on March 9th of representatives of the broadcasting industry and the churches on matters of common concern.

We deeply regret that you cannot join us, but I assure you that we fully understand your problem. I trust that on some future occasion we may have the benefit of your counsel.

You may be interested to know who the persons in the consultation will be. A list is attached.

On the personal side may I say that many of us who have benefited for more than twenty years from your creative and prophetic contribution to broadcasting have been much interested in recent developments, including your statement last fall to your fellow broadcasters and your recent decision to spend a year in travel and other activities. You will not, of course, remember me, but I had the privilege of meeting you as long ago as 1935 in a conference of International Student Service in Holland.

I trust that your forthcoming leave will accomplish for you all that you hope and expect.

1934 – SILVER ANNIVERSARY – 1959

OF THE

HEADLINER AWARDS

A newspapermen's frolic sponsored by the Press Club of Atlantic City in 1934 was the birthstone of what was to become the first all-inclusive annual journalism contest in the entire news disseminating industry. So successful was the original Frolic that the Press Club decided to establish an award for outstanding efforts in various news caterogies.

Accordingly, in 1935, the first annual National Headliners' contest was held and the National Headliners Club founded. During the past 25 years, nearly 500 have won the Headliner medal, including individual writers, newspapers, radio and television stations, magazines and newsreels and still and motion picture photographers.

Membership in the exclusive Headliners' Club is limited to those who have won the Headliner silver medallion, and the men who serve as consultants and judges in the selection of each year's winners.

While many of the winners have been "by-line names" in their respective fields, the judges have unveiled—and each year seek—new talent that might otherwise go unnoticed. It is the only Journalism Award that recognizes the work of small circulation newspapers, small town writers, individual radio and television stations, and news photography in all its phases.

The Press Club of Atlantic City is proud to foster and continue to sponsor this worthwhile project to honor achievement of those behind the news.

Dear Mr. Murrow,

Your Secretary tells me that your stay in London is expected to be over at the end of the month. I understand that your future movements are somewhat uncertain but I am writing to express the hope that at some time in your future travels you will find time to come and dine as the guest of the Political and Economic Circle of this Club.

You will see from the enclosed list of speakers that we have had many distinguished men in their own field and we should be honoured if you would come and speak on the subject of your choice.

The dinner is an informal one to which ladies are invited and we should ask you to speak to about 35 to 40 minutes and answer questions if you were so disposed. We would prefer two or three weeks notice if that could be given on a future visit to London. We very much hope that this will be possible during your wide travels.

With all good wishes.

Yours sincerely,

Coss Billson,
Secretary.

February 4, 1958

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc.
485 Madison Avenue
New York 22, New York

Dear Mr. Murrow:

The National Safety Council issues a round-up of odd accidents once a year, and my wife heard one on your newscast of Monday, February 3 that I believe certainly would qualify.

It was about a Miss Gill, my wife said, of Goldsboro, North Carolina, who did all sorts of queer things when she was taking her driving test.

If someone in your news room could track this down and send it to me, I'd be awfully grateful.

May I take this chance to tell you that my wife and I are consistent and devoted fans of your "Person to Person" and "See It Now" shows? You have brought a great deal of pleasure into our home by enabling us to see people whose habits and way of living we would never know if it weren't for you.

Sincerely,

Paul Jones

FREAK SQUEAKS of '57

by Paul Jones

EACH YEAR the National Safety Council makes a roundup of odd accidents. The 1957 crop was presented in an article in the Council's magazine, TRAFFIC SAFETY, under the title, "Freak Squeaks of '56." This is a reprint of the article. Any part or all of it may be used for newspaper or magazine articles, for radio broadcasts or for speeches. Proofs of the sketches are available. A credit line to the National Safety Council would be appreciated.

FREAK SQUEAKS of '57

by Paul Jones

SO 1957 was just another year?

Try to tell that to Dr. Guy Jones. Or George Bates. Or John Arends. Or to Dogcatcher Donald Baird.

For it was in 1957 that—

Dr. Jones was vaccinated by a cow.

Mr. Bates was clobbered on the highway by a flying canoe.

Mr. Arends suffered severe injuries by becoming a father.

And Dogcatcher Baird was bitten not by a dog, but by a dog owner—a mad one!

Just another year? Hah!

And the oddities listed above were only a few of the weird and wacky happenings uncovered by the National Safety Council in its annual roundup of freak accidents.

The dizzy details:

The Case of the Vaccinated Veterinarian occurred in Wadesboro, N. C., where Dr. Guy Jones got a syringe full of vaccine in his arm when a cow he was preparing to inoculate suddenly lunged against him. Moral: never vaccinate a cow at lunge time!

George Bates, of Evanston, Ill., is aware, of course, that in today's traffic a driver must be prepared for almost anything. Nevertheless, he was startled when a flying canoe zoomed down the highway straight at him, crashed through his windshield and clobbered him good. It had been blown loose from the top of an approaching car by a high wind.

John Arends, of Olympia, Wash., can tell you what any man knows—that becoming a father is no picnic. After an all-night vigil at the hospital, Mr. Arends proudly rushed up to kiss his wife as she was wheeled from the delivery room. At the whiff of the ether, he passed out cold, landed kerplunk on the concrete floor. Mother and child? Doing fine. Father? Two broken teeth and a banged-up face!

And in East Los Angeles, Calif., Dogcatcher Donald Baird was bitten good and hard by a lady who seemed upset because Baird was trying to impound her pet. "It's a dog's life," moaned Baird.

As a professional landscaper, Harry Westcott, of Mt. Upton, N. Y., knows better, you bet, than to saw off a limb on which he is sitting. But he did saw off one to which his safety rope was attached. Always something new to learn!

In Morningside Heights, New York City, two workers on a new skyscraper fell into an open elevator shaft 21 floors above the ground. Donald McKeon fell four floors, grabbed a cable and swung himself safely onto the 17th floor landing. William Vessialides plunged 18 floors before he managed to seize a cable and ease himself onto a third-floor landing platform. Both men escaped with minor bruises.

And in Long Beach, Calif., movie actor Jeff Chandler understandably put so much fervor into a love scene with Kim Novak that he cracked one of her ribs.

The John Bakers of Bellflower, Calif., didn't have to lift a hand to arrange for a rumpus with which to christen their fine new rumpus room. A passing automobile obliged by going out of control and crashing into the room for one of the darnedest rumpuses you ever heard.

Fifteen-year-old Susan Thomson, of Madison, Wis., didn't invite her father to go along when she took the family car for an unauthorized spin which ended when she banged into a tree. He couldn't have gone anyway. As governor of Wisconsin, he was busy at the moment attending a highway safety conference on teen-age driving.

In San Diego, Calif., a car rolled out of a driveway, crossed the street and crashed into the porch of a home. When police arrived they found the driver happily wagging his tail. His name was Jack and his owner, Don Snyder, had forgotten to set the hand brake when he left the dog alone in the car. Jack had climbed behind the wheel, put paw to gear shift, and let 'er roll.

When 3-year-old George Wilkins' mother found him playing with matches in the Wilkins home in San Antonio, Tex., she picked him up to warm his seat. She didn't have to. It already was warm. Matches in Georgie's hip pocket had set his pants on fire.

Mrs. Charles Drennon, of Memphis, Tenn., still doesn't know for sure that the little light in the refrigerator really goes out when you close the door. She was still peering intently inside when she slammed the door shut. Her nose wasn't broken, the doctor said. Just good and sore.

Thomas Ciappa, of Oswego, N. Y., wondered if it wouldn't be smart to have his brakes relined. He decided definitely it would be when his car kept right on going through the door of the brake-testing station. Damage, $300.

It was bound to happen sooner or later, of course, and it did—to Melvin Carter, of Kinlock, Mo. Trying eagerly to hitchhike a ride, Melvin edged a bit too close to traffic and a passing car whacked his outstretched thumb so hard he had to have it treated. He eventually took a bus.

And in Auburn, Mich., George Pero literally gave up his seat—to a strip-run driver. As Mr. Pero leaned over his car, parked beside the highway, a passing auto caught his trousers and deftly whisked them off, leaving him standing there redfaced.

No matter how changeable your climate may be, chances are you never saw the mercury go down as fast as it did when Robert Sherfield swallowed a clinical thermometer in a hospital at Bournemouth, England.

Even in a city as big as Chicago, a man and his wife will occasionally run into each other on the street. But Dr. and Mrs. Alex Buchholz did it the hard way—each driving a car. Dr. Buchholz, uninjured, insisted on taking the other driver to a hospital for personalized treatment.

In Plant City, Fla., Mrs. Lizzie B. Morgan took a direct route to reach the automobile licensing bureau for her driving test. She stepped on the accelerator instead of the brake and crashed into the building which houses the bureau.

It was hard for 10-year-old Marshall Frey to figure out just how he happened to ram his bike into a parked car on a street in Miami Beach, Fla. "All I was doing," he told police, "was riding along reading my comic book."

Police were horrified when they pulled Harold Donath from the wreckage of his overturned bakery truck in West Palm Beach, Fla. His face appeared to be a mass of blood. Closer inspection disclosed it was only cherry pie. A crummy trick!

In Chicago, Mrs. George Reithal solicitously entered the darkened bedroom where her husband lay recuperating from a badly sprained ankle, tripped over the crutch protruding from his bed, fell and broke her arm.

One of Charles Combs' farmhands at Olney, Ill., knew a surefire way to get rid of those wasps in the barn. He would burn them out. It worked. The wasps went up in smoke. So did the barn, 5,000 bales of hay, 2,000 bushels of barley, a utility shed, a garage, three drums of gasoline, and 200 loads of manure. And that ain't hay!

In Los Angeles, two safety award-winning taxi drivers—George Madden with 15 years without an accident and Harry Hayman with eight—made out accident reports the same day. They had collided with each other.

The perfect way to close this treatise, of course, would be to report that when the San Francisco earthquake of 1957 jarred loose a National Safety Council award proudly hanging on the wall above Cartoonist Al Vermeer's drawing board in Castro Valley, the bronze plaque bopped him on the head. But the capricious little sprites who arrange such things slipped up on this one. The darned thing missed Al by a full inch!

So 1957 was just another year? Hah!

Mr. Edward R. Murrow, Commentator.
Columbia Broadcasting System.
485 Madison Ave.
New York, N.Y.

Dear Mr. Murrow;-

One of the most profound truths of this century is contained in ---"We are I think, going to find out something about our country. Are we merely an accident of history and geography?" --- to quote from your program of Nov. 27th. For one thing, it convinces me you have knowledge of current history few people possess. Most of us have been indulging in a lot of wishful-thinking --- hypnotized ourselves because of our "fantastic" prosperity, without attempting to understand how, and why, it has been achieved. You express it"----- so that two World Wars left us even richer, stronger, and more productive than before". I would put it in terms of economics --- we used money, even if it was debt-money, to build machines for vastly more production. Our pioneer ancestors used muscle and sweat and hard work. Today, it is money invested in machines which achieves prosperity, not human sweat.

Mr. Murrow, we are, now, in an economic transition period in much the same way as we were in a POLITICAL transition period when our nation was founded. The whole world is desperately searching for a solution to this economic problem, without fully understanding what it is they are seeking. We realize the danger in "H" Bombs and machine guns,however, to again quote you ---"We in this country do not face a trial by fire. The challenge is utterly different." You are so right --- and, that statement means much more to me than it does to many people. I have made quite a study of economics and realize, as I am quite sure you do, that the solution of world problems will come from how well we solve our economic problems --- and, may I suggest the accumulation of money, as such, is not the answer, as so many seem to think. Real prosperity and security is indivisible. "United we stand, divided we fall".

Mr. Murrow, there are times for reflection --- times for words --- times for action. We, as a nation, a leader in world affairs, will be judged, now, by what action we take. I submit, time may be running out. Which action is the purpose of this letter.

When our nation was founded some very wise men set forth in our national constitution the purpose of our government, any government, If our form of government is to survive our generation should establish what I have called an "Economic Constitution" in which there should be set forth the purpose of an economic system and offer the principles under which our economic system should function. I have stated many times "no economic system can endure without a built-in moral concept".

I have proposed to several U.S. Senators, including Senator Frank Lauche, an old golfing partner of mine, that an organization be promoted to establish such an "Economic Constitution", However, I do not expect Senator Lauche would initiate such an organization --- he plays his politics close to his chest. Then too, I know of no politician who possesses the profound knowledge of world affairs as you do, or the courage to propose something as new as an "economic constitution". Our people will rise to "the occasion" if the danger is close enough. There are no medals for "economic courage", nor any monuments erected. As you said "We in this country do not face a trial by fire". However, in my humble opinion, to quote you again --- "Meanwhile, we must make our plans, our policies and our sacrifices in cold blood". -- and, "Nothing less than the sum total of man's achievements to date is at stake" --- in how we adjust our economic system to the needs of mass-production and the unconscience ~~##########~~ striving by society for an economic system which not only offers the standard of living which science has made possible ~~and~~ but within the framework of morals and ethics.

We are in a desperate struggle with Communism, a struggle on two fronts. One military. The other in the field of economics. As you said in your Thanksgiving broadcast, " It is possible that the world will again resort to the terrible arbitrament of war. No one knows." I do not believe men will, again, be so stupid as to attempt the resolve their differences in total war when all know there will be nothing left for anyone if "H" Bombs begin to drop from the skies. Again may I quote you ---"We can lose our freedom while busily preparing to defend it". I assume you meant, at least in part, that our economy could be so disrupted by releasing huge amounts to money in building our military defenses that our entire economy would fall apart. Money-prosperity, Mr. Murrow, will not stand the test of time.

Naturally, having spent a lot of time making a study of economics and writing a book on the subject twelve years ago, I have some knowledge of the subject. However, a letter is not the place to discuss economics. However, I am not gifted with word-making. You could, I am quite sure make a tremendous contribution to the kind of world which would make this a better world in which to live if you would use your talents to bring into being an "Economic Constitution" under which all decent citizens would unite in striving to achieve universal good --- a moral and ethical economic system. Then, your position in the communication business affords the opportunity which is not available to me.

I am quite sure if this letter is ever read by you you will understand what I am attempting to say in my fumbling way. I wish I had the opportunity to discuss the matter with you. A letter is not adequate to examine a matter so broad in its implications.

May I offer my best wishes

Yours Very Truly, B.T. Neal

Dear Tom:

Belated thank you for yours of February 17.

Nothing would give me greater pleasure than to join you at the Bohemian Grove, but there is no chance at all that I can do it.

I have heard about the encampment for many years but have never managed to accept an invitation. It would have given me particular pleasure to be there with you.

I am sure that we will manage a meeting either here or in Los Angeles some time in the course of the year.

Again, many thanks.

Sincerely yours,

Dear Ed:

Congratulations and best wishes on your decision to take some time off for travel and contemplation. I have had this opportunity recently and it has enriched me tremendously and I am sure it will do the same for you and all whom you meet.

As a starter or a part of your journey, may I invite you to be my guest at the Bohemian Grove which is the mid-summer encampment of the Bohemian Club of San Francisco, July 18th through August 2d. The members of the Club and their guests will be enjoying the three thousand acres of virgin redwood trees at the Grove on Russian River, Sonoma County, on the coast a few miles north of San Francisco.

I am sure you have heard of this institution dedicated to the meditative arts as well as to music, acting, painting and good fellowship. If you have not, I would like to correspondence with you further before you make up your mind, for it is an experience which, I assure you, cannot be found by man anywhere else on the globe.

Many members and guests spend the entire time within the Grove having "cremated care", with the opening pageant on Saturday night and enjoy the quiet of the redwoods, the symphony concerts, the musical production, and the opera continuously; others spend their weekends at the Grove and return to the "market place" for a few days each of the two intervening weeks.

Please consider it and work it into your schedule if at all possible.

With kindest personal regards,

Sincerely yours,

Tom

We know that you have already received a request from the National Easter Seals Society that you decorate an egg for our exhibition here at Neiman-Marcus this Easter.

All you have to do is let your artistic talents have full reign, than replace the egg in this same carton. You will find a correctly addressed label which you can simply put over the existing one on the carton now. The correct stamps are also enclosed, and so is enough tape to bind the carton thoroughly.

We look forward tremendously to getting your decorated egg, and we do ask that you send it as soon as possible. We are all very grateful to you for your time and effort.

Ever since shortly after you and my friend Vance McCay(remember him?) left Pullman, Washington, I have been kept pleasantly informed via your discriminating perception of important news.

All the way from "This is London," down through "Hear It Now" and "See It Now," the annual reports and forecasts, and now "Small World," you have done a lot of cogitating and digesting for many of us.

A word of appreciation for a valued service is the least one can offer and I've felt I owed you a "thanks" for a long time. Now I feel better and I hope you do too. I also hope you will continue to speak as long as I can hear.

Dear Sir:

Your recent criticism of the TV medium was more than justified.

The American fabric and its magnificent tapestry of development and vibrant ferment of ideas is being completely ignored. Why go to India, Africa, the Middle East for material when it lies here under our very noses?

For example, here in Skokie, where I live, a consuming political struggle is taking place—which will reach its climactic peak Jan. 20.

Fifty five thousand inhabitants are being shaken to the core by the struggle between a powerful prehistoric type of "boss" and the dynamic challenge of the "newcomers" threatening the old forms of domination.

As a newspaperman, I have seldom seen anything to rival the intensity of this battle. And the issues are stark, clear-cut.

In one corner, like a malignant charm is Martin "Scotty" Krier, the township committeeman. Every word he utters is as jealously weighed as the Hope diamond.

In the other corner, almost a dozen property owner groups and their leaders, are who have organized into a village-wide council.

As the puppets of Scotty Krier are a meager half dozen trustees and their village president, who constitute the government. One of them is Raymond Krier, son of "Scotty."

Zoning is completely under the thumb of greedy realtors and builders who have swarmed over Skokie like locusts to devour and strip the village of its noblest and most viable aspects.

A recent case in point is the Sharp Corner school area controversy. Neighbors, teachers, ministers and rabbis protested the proposed building of a bowling alley and the selling of liquor on its premises because of the proximity of the school. They stormed the village meeting in strong opposition.

Over the pleas and outcries of the people, the bowling alley and liquor permit were granted.

Gasoline stations, sometimes on every corner of an intersection were granted in steamroller fashion--right down across the public will.

Huge apartment buildings went up in complete disregard of the people's wish to remain suburban. This, despite every effort by residents in fights before the zoning board of appeals, the plan commission and the board of trustees.

Weary of being "pushed around" and of losing every appeal to reason and tired of submission of the peoples will to a brute force that represents less than half (by vote) of the population, the people will attempt to strike a blow for freedom--on Jan. 20.

On that day, after a series of thwarting moves by Krier and the trustees, a referendum will be held to give Skokie a ~~referendum~~ representative government.

The board of trustees had previously rejected thousands of names on petitions asking for the referendum after sitting on the petitions for 30 days.

It went to the Circuit court. The late Judge Harry Fisher granted the referendum. A judgement was slapped against it, holding up action, as the Krier forces edged the decision up to the Supreme court.

Again, judicial wisdom prevailed, and the village was ordered to hold an election on whether or not Skokie was to remain a village or become a city with 16 aldermanic representatives instead of the six "at large" trustees.

It may be too late. Jan. 20 is only hours away. Be my guest. Come to Skokie, with your cameramen. I'm pleading for the truth. Go, look at "Scotty" Krier with your camera's eye.

Capture the ferment of the village and depict a vital part of America's growth. It lies here instantaneously ready to be told--the story of a great political upheaval in the fastest growing community in the country. Within the span of two decades, it has grown from less than 5000 to 55,000 people.

Let me lead you by the hand through a really amazing pattern of people and ideas. What richer fabric will you strike anywhere?

Our towns are marvelous media for TV. Take Mayor Egan and Aurora. Or Glenview, where a newspaper columnist is mayor.

Come to Skokie—now. Tell your story. It needs to be told.

I haven't seen you (except on Television) since that evening in Schipol airport when you were returning from Berlin. I am still doing airline advertising but am now handling the Lufthansa account instead of KLM.

The reason for this letter is that my daughter, Mrs. Mary Coogan, is working for the National Audience Board at 152 East End Avenue. They publish a newsletter and Mary is anxious to interview you and secure an article. They are a social welfare organization interested in promoting better television programs.

I suggested to Mary that she call your secretary next week for an appointment, but that I would pave the way by dropping you a line. She graduated from Vassar a year ago and has been working since September at the National Audience Board.

I do hope that you can arrange to give her a few minutes. I would certainly appreciate it and I know she will. Or it would be even better if we could all have lunch together.

I was very pleased that on your CBS radio news commentary two days ago, you discussed the significant relationship between the role of money in election campaigns and in the form of gifts and favors to administrative officials. I would appreciate having a copy of the text of your broadcast.

I am also glad that you mentioned the proposal for Federal financing of elections that was made by Theodore Roosevelt in 1907, although I regret that you did not identify its modern embodiment in the form of my proposals which I have recently asked President Eisenhower to consider in a message to the Congress patterned upon that of his illustrious predecessor. While I recognize the doubts and difficulties that you expressed, I hope that further consideration will at least bring you to support public assistance for campaign spending in the minimum form of a tax credit for contributions.

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE 85th CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION

Vol. 104 WASHINGTON, THURSDAY, JUNE 19, 1958 10555

CONFLICT OF INTEREST, GIFTS, AND POLITICAL CAMPAIGN CONTRIBUTIONS

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD an excerpt from President Eisenhower's news conference of June 18, 1958, in which he discussed the case of his assistant, Gov. Sherman Adams.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXCERPT FROM PRESIDENT'S NEWS CONFERENCE JUNE 18, 1958, ON SHERMAN ADAMS SITUATION

First, as a result of this entire incident, all of us should have been made aware of one truth; that is, that a gift is not necessarily a bribe. One is evil; the other is a tangible expression of friendship. Almost without exception, everybody seeking public office accepts political contributions. These are gifts to further his political career. Yet we do not make a generality that these gifts are intended to color the later official votes, recommendations, and actions of the recipients. In the general case this whole activity is understood, accepted, and approved. The circumstances surrounding the innocent receipt by a public official of any gift are therefore important, so that the public may clearly distinguish between innocent and guilty action.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD the text of a letter which I addressed to the President of the United States under date of June 18, 1958.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JUNE 18, 1958.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House, Washington, D. C.

My DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: In speaking of the gifts received by your assistant, Gov. Sherman Adams, at your press conference today, you rightly placed the question of the significance of such gifts in the greater perspective of our whole political and governmental system, when you compared them with the far larger donations which virtually every elective official must seek and accept in our American political campaigns.

I fully agree with you about the relevance and importance of this comparison, and I would like to congratulate you on having brought it to public attention through the effective medium of your press conference. It is a subject on which I have myself often spoken and written before and since coming to the United States Senate, and on which I have made a number of legislative proposals. That is why I am taking the liberty of writing you about your reference to it today.

At your press conference, you made the point that in the context of American politics, it is inconsistent to see bribery in every personal gift to a public official, but to make no such generalization about the many thousands of dollars which are regularly given to election campaign funds to permit these public officials, or their elected superiors, to further their political careers. I would also like to express my agreement with you that this point is the crux of the whole question of money in politics and Government.

Yet is it accurate to accept the opposite generalization about our practice of financing democratic elections from immense, privately donated campaign funds, that this whole activity is understood, accepted and approved?

Not long ago, in your veto message of the bill to exempt natural gas producers from Federal regulation, you referred to a campaign contribution offered to a Senator when you stated that certain backers of the bill had sought to further their own interest by highly questionable activities. And you rightly went on to state that these men's offer of campaign contributions could risk creating doubt among the American people concerning the integrity of governmental processes. Only a few days ago, leading members of your party in the Senate devoted many hours to drawing adverse inferences from the collection and contribution of election campaign funds by trade union political committees. Undoubtedly, it is as wrong to generalize that all political contributions give rise to undue obligations, as that all personal gifts to public officials do so. But I cannot agree that our present system of campaign financing is widely understood; or that, if it were understood, it would be accepted and approved. With constantly growing modern election costs, must not the integrity of governmental processes built on the private collection of these vast funds increasingly come into doubt?

Half a century ago, a very illustrious Republican predecessor of yours in the White House addressed himself to this question. In a message to the Congress on December 3, 1907, President Theodore Roosevelt spoke of the inadequacy of limitations, controls and disclosure laws to meet the problem of money in politics. He said:

"There is always danger in laws of this kind, which from their very nature are difficult of enforcement; the danger being lest they be obeyed only by the honest, and disobeyed by the unscrupulous, so as to act only as a penalty upon honest men."

Then he continued:

"There is a very radical measure which would, I believe, work a substantial improvement in our system of conducting a campaign, although I am well aware that it will take some time for people so to familiarize themselves with such a proposal as to be willing to consider its adoption. The need for collecting large campaign funds would vanish if Congress provided an appropriation for the proper and legitimate expenses of each of the great national parties, an appropriation ample enough to meet the necessity for thorough organization and machinery, which requires a large expenditure of money. Then the stipulation should be made that no party receiving campaign funds from the Treasury should accept more than a fixed amount from any individual subscriber or donor; and the necessary publicity for receipts and expenditures could without difficulty be provided."

Half a century has passed since President Theodore Roosevelt said that time would be needed to consider his proposal. During that half century, the number of voters that must be reached in a campaign, the mediums of communication, and the resulting costs of carrying on an election campaign have multiplied in proportions that would have staggered even his imagination. If the role of campaign funds in elections was a moral problem of democratic self-govenment in 1907, how vastly more crucial a problem must we recognize it to be today.

That is why I am writing you today, to urge you to renew the effort made by President Theodore Roosevelt to set a new standard for the role of money in our public affairs—not merely with respect to the occasional imprudent acceptance of gifts or hospitality by government officials, but for the far more fundamental matter of the whole financing of political campaigns in our Nation to which you referred this morning. It is my earnest hope that you might address to the Congress a message on this central modern problem of our democracy, including appropriate legislative recommendations which would bring up to date President Roosevelt's proposals for public underwriting of essential and legitimate election costs so as to free our political processes from their present dangerous dependence on large, private campaign contributions.

This present dependence on private sources of adequate campaign financing distorts the free choice of the people among competing candidates and programs. It often prevents able men from seeking public office. It inevitably creates the suspicion of special obligations of public officials and thus impairs popular confidence in government.

For these reasons, Mr. President, if by reviving President Theodore Roosevelt's farsighted recommendations to Congress, you can help to bring about the end of the dominant and growing role of campaign contributions in the politics of our country, your place in the history of reform in our democracy would be forever assured.

Respectfully,

United States Senator.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, I shall state the general purpose and contents of my letter to the President. The President compared the gifts made to Sherman Adams with political campaign contributions. I commended the President for calling the attention of the American people to this relationship. I said:

I fully agree with you about the relevance and importance of this comparison, and I would like to congratulate you on having brought it to public attention through the effective medium of your press conference.

I then said I had some disagreement with the President:

Yet is it accurate to accept the opposite generalization about our practice of financing democratic elections from immense, privately donated campaign funds, that this whole activity is understood, accepted, and approved?

I referred to the fact that the President himself in his veto message last year, when he refused to approve the natural gas bill, called the attention of the Senate and House to certain unpleasant aspects of political campaign contributions associated with the natural gas bill. I also pointed out that some of the President's own supporters in this Chamber only a few nights ago made certain adverse implications with respect to donations to political campaigns by trade-union political-education funds.

Then I appealed to the President to use the great prestige and influence of his office to bring about the reform in our Nation which was first proposed a half century ago by one of the President's great predecessors, a member of his own party, Theodore Roosevelt.

President Theodore Roosevelt recommended that the dangerous cesspool of large political contributions be drained by having the Federal Government underwrite political campaigns.

I concluded my letter to the President with these paragraphs:

The present dependence on private sources of adequate campaign financing distorts the free choice of the people among competing candidates and programs. It often prevents able men from seeking public office. It inevitably creates the suspicion of special obligations of public officials and thus impairs popular confidence in government.

For these reasons, Mr. President, if by reviving President Theodore Roosevelt's far-sighted recommendations to Congress, you can help to bring about the end of the dominant and growing role of campaign contributions in the politics of our country, your place in the history of reform in our democracy would be forever assured.

Mr. President, in conclusion, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point a memorandum on reforms in campaign financing, which I presented to the committee headed by the able Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McClellan], dated February 28, 1957.

MEMORANDUM ON REFORMS IN CAMPAIGN FINANCING

Everyone agrees that modern election costs have made present limitations on campaign spending unrealistic, and that they are in fact dead letters. Excesses in the collection and expenditure of modern campaign funds are largely the result of unrestrained competition for public attention through extremely expensive mediums, particularly television, radio, printed materials, and signs. As long as candidates must raise from private sources the vast sums needed for this expensive competition, it will be futile to reliance on large campaign contributions, with all the attendant dangers to true representative democracy.

This memorandum is designed to present to the special committee suggestions on a series of the issues presented by proposed reforms of campaign financing, with special emphasis on the principle of public assumption of basic election costs as an essential element in any reform.

I. PUBLIC ASSUMPTION OF BASIC ELECTION COSTS

President Theodore Roosevelt told Congress in 1907 that "The need for collecting large campaign funds would vanish if Congress provided an appropriation for the proper and legitimate expenses * * * which requires a large expenditure of money."

The large expenditure needed for a modern campaign has multiplied many times since the days of Theodore Roosevelt, when TV and radio were unknown and other expenses were much lower. The time has come to recognize that in a democracy the presentation of political candidates and issues to the voters in a campaign is not something done for the candidates, but for the public who must exercise as informed a choice as they can among them. The expense of making this information equitably available to the electorate is a legitimate cost of democratic self-government.

Many alternative ways are available for carrying out this principle, once it is recognized.

1. Public funds for campaign broadcast time: A certain number of minutes of broadcast time on radio and television stations covering the State or congressional district could be established as reasonable and adequate use of these mediums in campaigns for Federal office. Candidates could then be authorized to submit vouchers covering that much broadcast time for payment of one-half of the cost from public appropriations, on condition they limited themselves to this reasonable amount of broadcast time. This principle could be extended to certain other mediums, for instance holders of second-class mailing privileges.

2. Direct payments to political party committees: President Roosevelt's proposal of direct appropriations was incorporated in S. 3242 in the 84th Congress, which would establish a formula based on the total number of votes cast in preceding national elections. This avoids any governmental influence over the choice of media or other legitimate use of the funds (except for audits of reports). It would seem particularly appropriate for presidential election committees and for the necessary expenditures of the National Committee for the National Conventions, etc.

3. Tax incentives to encourage wider individual contributions: There has been much discussion recently of tax reductions for campaign contributions, and this was included in S. 3308 last year. It can be conclusively demonstrated that a tax deduction would be highly discriminatory, perhaps unconstitutional, and would only exacerbate the present inequality among contributors, because (a) only a small minority of taxpayers have reason to itemize deductions rather than take the standard deduction, and (b) among even this minority, the value of the deduction increases with higher income. A small tax credit, for instance of $10, would avoid these inequalities and would effectively stimulate small individual contributions.

4. State voters' pamphlets: The Federal Government might, on a matching-fund basis, underwrite half the cost of a State voters' pamphlet such as that sent to every registered voter in the State of Oregon, which gives much basic information and makes available equal space to all candidates for public office.

The above four forms of providing public funds for election expenses are mutually consistent and serve different and complementary purposes. All should be enacted.

II. PROBLEMS ARISING UNDER PUBLIC FUNDS PLANS

1. The third-party problem: If public funds are to be used in election campaigns, they must be available to candidates other than those of the two major parties. This can be done, with protection against abuse of the public funds, by requiring each candidate or his campaign committee to post bond for one-half the amount of the public funds used, conditioned on the candidate's receiving at least 10 percent of the total vote cast for the office in question.

2. The control problem: Use of public funds for campaign expenses would make more urgent than ever the problems of assuring adequate controls over the reporting of campaign expenditures and contributions. But whether or not public funds are used, a modernized system of reports, audits and field investigations of campaign financing should be set up outside either Congress or an agency of the executive branch, both of whom are too closely associated in the public mind with the electoral process. The best available agency for assuming new, affirmative responsibility for maintaining an independent review of campaign financing is the General Accounting Office, particularly if public funds are to be involved.

3. The problem of primaries: In view of the decisive importance of primary elections in many States, programs of public financial support for election costs should be extended to primaries. Oregon's voters' pamphlet is used in primaries, and the tax credit could also easily be usable for a contribution to a candidate in a primary rather than a final election.

III. LIMITS ON CONTRIBUTIONS AND EXPENDITURES

Once the principles of public assumption of much of the cost of public access to candidates and their views is accepted, and the necessary burden of collecting campaign funds correspondingly reduced, it will become possible for the first time to deal realistically with controls of the evils of large private contributions and excessive expenditures. Withholding of the public funds, or loss of the privilege of tax credit, would be far more effective deterrents than unenforceable criminal penalties for evasion of reasonable limits. Also, the knowledge of access to at least a fair minimum of campaign costs from public funds will free candidates to make a virtue of compliance and will make excessive expenditures from large private contributions unacceptable to the public and unprofitable to candidates.

The following are suggested considerations on the traditional problems of limits and controls over contributions and expenditures:

1. Distinction between contributions and expenditures:

Personal participation in political campaigns is a basic constitutional right of American citizens. Therefore, expenditures made by individuals openly and in their own names on means of expressing their support for or opposition to a candidate, party, or issue probably cannot constitutionally be restricted, nor forced to be channeled through specified agencies. This prevents legal control on total expenditures in an election.

On the other hand, contributions made to a candidate or a committee, to be spent by them rather than by the contributor, do not constitute such a constitutionally protected form of free speech and may be limited to a reasonable maximum. (Controls may probably be extended to the spending of political committees created expressly for a campaign, as distinguished from the activities of ordinary full-time organizations which have an identity, activities, and a known membership for purposes apart from politics.)

2. Restrictions on individual contributions:

Once funds for reasonable and adequate campaign costs can readily be met in part from public funds and in part from small individual tax-free contributions, the size of individual gifts could and should be strictly limited—perhaps to $50 per person in support of the campaign of any one candidate for Federal office. The tax credit could be conditioned on an affidavit that no more had been given, and public campaign funds could be conditioned on an affidavit by campaign committees that no more had been accepted from any individual.

Only persons eligible to vote should be entitled to the tax credit.

3. Limitations on total spending: As stated above, if the political activities and efforts of individuals and ordinary, nonpolitical organizations are taken into account, it is both legally and practically impossible to place a limit on total campaign expenditures. However, the possible loss of eligibility for public funds or for the tax credit privilege can serve to enforce reasonable limits on those expenditures within the control of the candidate himself or his political committee, for instance to limit the total amount of his appearances or other broadcasts on radio or television.

The eventual overall effect of this program will surely be fourfold: (1) To give the public a more nearly equal opportunity to see and judge competing candidates for public office and their platforms and programs; (2) to eliminate the unhealthy and undemocratic significance of candidates' dependence on large campaign contributions; (3) to make a virtue of staying within the prescribed normal limits in the competitive use for the exepnsive modern mediums and techniques of campaigning which have driven the cost of running for public office out of sight for the average citizen without large financial support, and thus to reduce excessive spending; (4) to display more clearly the nature of the support of candidates, insofar as individuals and groups are limited in making contributions to political candidates or committees and thus driven to participate openly in campaigns in their own names.

Full reporting of political expenditures may and should be required of any person or group, but it does not alone go to the root of the problem. Theodore Roosevelt said in his message of 1907:

"It is well * * * to provide for the publication of both contributions and expenditures. There is, however, always danger in laws of this kind, which from their very nature are difficult of enforcement; the danger being lest they be obeyed only by the honest, and disobeyed by the unscrupulous, so as to act only as a penalty upon honest men."

No tinkering with regulatory laws will reform the evil of dependence on large campaign contributions, until the heavy inevitable costs of bringing a modern election campaign to the public's attention is borne in part by the public itself. No reform could be a better investment in the democratic process which is our greatest national pride.

Texas, was published in the Washington Evening Star of June 13, 1958, by the distinguished syndicated columnist William S. White, a winner of the Pulitzer prize for biography. I ask unanimous consent that this column by William S. White, entitled "JOHNSON, the Ablest Leader," be printed in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JOHNSON, THE ABLEST LEADER—TEXAS DEMOCRAT VIEWED AS HAVING STRIKES AGAINST HIM ON PRESIDENCY

(By William S. White)

On the plain test of getting things done, LYNDON B. JOHNSON, of Texas, is the ablest Senate majority leader in many decades. This is the reluctant estimate even of those who do not like him, his ideas or policies.

As a man, Senator JOHNSON is at times a hard-as-nails handful. Like most brilliant people, he suffers fools only in excessively frank, eye-rolling pain and impatience. He has great practicality, and again great sentimentality; a very demanding approach, and again a very considerate approach.

He is, in short, a genius in politics, or at least in parliamentary politics. His conduct is unpredictable in its details, and often brusquely so. But his achievements in general are so extraordinary as to make him, if this one measure be used, almost unarguably the outstanding Democrat in the country today.

In his forum and in his field—that is, in the Senate and in legislation—he could master any half dozen of his rivals all at once without raising any great sweat.

He could never do this by speaking; he is an indifferent orator—but a good listener when he wants to be. He could do it—and many times has—through his peculiar talent of personal negotiation and persuasion.

It is an almost indescribable kind of persuasion in which Senator JOHNSON is perfectly capable of having his way, either by cajoling the person with whom he is dealing or by simply ordering him, in a way both pointblank and kindly, to do as he is told.

To have a face-to-face go-round with him at the top of his form is to undergo a dizzying series of personal experiences. Miss Mary McGrory of the Washington Star has coined for this process the term "the Lyndon Johnson A treatment." It must be experienced to be appreciated; it is no good trying to illustrate it.

But it is possible to say with some confidence that if Senator JOHNSON ever should meet Nikita Khrushchev, say, ordinary charity would require a small sigh of half-compassion for a hapless Russian.

Through the "A treatment," or lesser variations of it, Senator JOHNSON has solidified the Democratic party in the Senate into an organism of massive power where it used to be a collection of competing blocs.

Most any leader can sell his plans and purposes if, like a door-to-door salesman, he cuts his prices on demand. But the Senator never cuts his prices. More likely, he coolly raises them—and the other fellow somehow feels, all the same, that he is getting the better of it.

Thus, Senator JOHNSON has Democratic isolationists voting for foreign aid, and deep southern Senators accepting civil rights bills.

It is this very success, however, that brings to him most of the criticism that comes from advanced Democratic liberals. They put him down as a crass "operator"—and then call for his help on their own designs. They suggest that he lacks political conviction.

He was an early protege of Franklin D. Roosevelt and some of his intimate friends are old Roosevelt New Deal liberals—men like Tom Corcoran, Ben Cohen, Abe Fortas, and James Rowe, Jr.

Most of the newer Democratic liberals are far from the Johnson camp. But many of the older liberals—the Rowes, Corcorans, and so on—entirely understand his operating premise. This is that attitudes of fight, fight, fight don't carry you very far unless you have the troops—and that you can't keep enough troops without compromise sometimes.

Deeply sensitive to every form of criticism, Senator JOHNSON is excessively sensitive to it from any liberal source. It is a state of mind that is not helped by his awareness of the fact that he has been of more practical service to some liberal causes—public power and public housing among them—than have most of his detractors put together.

And as a pro he has none of the emotional approach of most of the advanced liberals. They think in visions of crusades; Senator JOHNSON thinks in terms of votes. They see him as a straddler. He sees them as shrilly insisting upon the impossible rather than sensibly settling for the possible.

Senator JOHNSON, a tall, rangy man with a ranch background, is far more western than southern. Nevertheless, Texas is historically a Confederate State. This fact powerfully works against the possibility that the Democratic convention of 1960 would ever give him what he insists—sometimes with loud, unprintable Texanisms—he does not want anyhow: The Presidential nomination.

Too, he is popularly identified—though to an exaggerated degree, as it happens—with the Texas oil and gas millionaires. And in 1955 he suffered a heart attack. Finally, there is no guarantee, of course, that his legislative skill could be translated into the administrative skill needed in the White House.

ARE WE SWATTING FLIES OR DRAINING THE SWAMP IN THE SHERMAN ADAMS CASE?

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may address the Senate for not to exceed 15 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, I believe it is time to place in perspective the episode involving Sherman Adams.

I believe that, in the context of modern American politics, Sherman Adams is only the latest scapegoat—like Col. Harry Vaughan before him—for a national course of conduct which has become commonplace and accepted in this country.

Sherman Adams is the victim of a system under which the spending of large sums of money on politics and politicians is virtually taken for granted among substantial segments of our society. He may not have been an innocent victim. I do not condone his conduct. But I think we should be honest and realistic in appraising it.

After all, it is not so long ago that the acceptance by a prominent politician of an $18,000 expense fund from real-estate and oil operators was turned into a personal triumph over a nationally broadcast television program. Do the gifts to Sherman Adams, about which we have heard so much, add up to a fraction of $18,000?

What is our premise about the obligations that are attached to gifts? Do we criticize Mr. Adams because he sought information from regulatory agencies in cases involving his friend, Mr. Goldfine, or do we criticize him because he accepted gifts and hotel suites from Mr. Goldfine?

When Sherman Adams committed his errors of judgment in doing favors for his friend, the public is being left to infer that he did this because of Mr. Goldfine's vicuna coats and hotel suites. Yet is Sherman Adams any more indebted to Mr. Goldfine for gifts than a man who sits in the Senate or in a governor's chair is indebted to those who collected $100,000 from big-business men or from trade-union political-education funds to pay for his campaign expenses?

Is Sherman Adams, with his $2,400 rug and $700 vicuna cloth coat more obligated to render unethical favors than is a Member of Congress who is dependent every few years on 20 times that amount from bankers, natural-gas and private-utility owners, and distillery executives to finance his billboards and radio and TV shows? What is the difference between one gift and another?

What is morality in government? Was it virtue for utility stockholders to contribute enormous sums to the Eisenhower campaigns, and then for the President's assistant, Sherman Adams, to call the SEC to postpone a crucial hearing in the Dixon-Yates case—but immorality for the same Sherman Adams to inquire from the SEC about the case of Mr. Goldfine, from whom he had received a $2,400 rug?

When Sherman Adams exercises the influence of the White House on the Department of the Interior, the Bureau of the Budget, and the FPC to dispose of the Hells Canyon power site to the private-utility interests who did so much for the Republican campaigns, is that merely the honest execution of national policy—but corruption if Sherman Adams phones the FTC for his old friend Mr. Goldfine, who had given him a vicuna coat? Does this not prove the wisdom of the old verse which goes:

The law backs up both man and woman
Who steals the goose from off the common
But lets the greater felon loose
Who steals the common from the goose?

PRESIDENT RECOGNIZES SAME FACTS

At his press conference last Wednesday, President Eisenhower himself was perfectly right in drawing attention to the contrast between really minor personal gifts and the vast funds which are customarily collected to further the political careers of almost everyone in American politics. I spoke last Thursday about my letter to the President, in which I expressed my agreement with him on this subject. Is this not the only realistic context in which to discuss the problems of money and morality in American politics? And is this not a context which should steer us away from too much smugness in these repeated pursuits of gifts and favors among executive leaders?

Is it morality for a Senator to collect $500 or $1,000 speaking fees from many labor unions or liberal groups and then to oppose a Federal right-to-work law—but immorality for Col. Harry Vaughan at the White House to be given a deep freeze?

Is it morality for oil and gas tycoons to stage great benefit dinners to collect hundreds of thousands of dollars for the campaigns of Members of Congress in distant States who will vote to lift Federal control from offshore-oil deposits or from natural-gas prices—but immorality for Sherman Adams to sign a hotel bill to the account of his friend Mr. Goldfine?

Could it be, Mr. President, that the taint of corruption attaches to the specific form of the benefaction, and not to its value?

Why is it that great and unctuous breast-beating rises in Congress when there are tangible gifts involved, such as rugs or hotel bills or deep freezes or coats—mink or vicuna—but strange silence about a $30-million campaign exchequer to elect a President or a one-half million dollar fund to put a Senator in office?

Is there a feeling that the public will understand coats and vacation trips and household furnishings, but is indifferent to colossal sums of money?

Surely some great historians of the future will be perplexed by the fact that some persons in Government during our era encountered grave embarrassment over the acceptance of kitchenware and hotel accommodations, while their brethren in high places were acclaimed as heroes for successfully employing campaign exchequers and personal-expense funds that dwarfed the other gifts in value. Could it be because a piece of furniture is more tangible than a bag of currency?

Again I say, Mr. President, let us scrutinize the assumptions and the major premise behind all this righteous indignation. I repeat, I am not speaking in defense of Sherman Adams—for, whatever may have been his other sins, he has certainly been among the most self-righteous of all with respect to the question of ethics in government. But Sherman Adams' many accusers proceed on the premise that, having accepted a rug and numerous hotel-bill payments, he inevitably was in moral bondage to Mr. Goldfine and had to do Mr. Goldfine's bidding. Do any of these accusers confront the question whether, having accepted campaign funds from, for instance, the automobile industry, they must do that industry's bidding on legislative matters. Or, having accepted campaign funds from labor, must they do labor's bidding when the roll is called in Senate or House?

In none of the questions I have raised in this brief speech am I referring to any individual Member of Congress. This is not an individual matter. Every person in American public life is trapped by a system which has encouraged the dominance of money in elections, which has permitted or even required public office to be placed on the auction block like a jewelry bauble—to be carried off by the highest bidder.

Congress has traditionally taken unto itself the vital role of watchdog over executive officers. Yet is morality divisible? The author of the Sermon on the Mount thought that it was not. He laid down a principle of universality of conduct which has stirred mankind ever since. He said:

> Verily I say unto you, inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me (Matthew 25, v. 40).

WHAT MOTIVES ARE MORE IMPORTANT

Mr. President, public officials may act honestly or meanly, in the best public interest or on behalf of special privilege. Does it make sense to assume that in their actions they will be motivated by insignificant personal gifts, but not by the past or future campaign treasuries upon which their power depends? To assume this is to place the collection of a few gadgets and luxuries as a motive of human conduct above the ambition for success in a public career, for national stature, for power to affect public policy in a measure that no coat or rug or deep freeze can equal.

In our political system today, Mr. President, the cost of such power and such ambition comes high. It is hardly to be compared with Mr. Goldfine's occasional largess toward his old friends. For example, it has been estimated by responsible scholars, and by journals of information and public opinion, that some $200 million was spent in 1956 to elect public officials to high offices throughout our Nation. Until we do something about this, we shall be swatting flies instead of draining the swamp.

REFORMS PROPOSED

I have long advocated two proposals which I believe will ultimately be the tests of the sincerity of congressional critics of Sherman Adams and such of his predecessors as Colonel Vaughan—be they on this or the other side of the aisle.

First, there are the proposals which I presented to the McClellan committee on lobbying and campaign expenditures, at the time of the studies which grew out of the attempted $2,500 campaign contribution from natural-gas interests to the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CASE]. These proposals would eliminate the present unhealthy and undesirable reliance on huge privately collected campaign funds by having major essential expenditures for all Federal candidates underwritten by the Federal Government, as President Theodore Roosevelt recommended to Congress as early as 1907.

Second, there are the proposals of my bill, S. 3979, to apply equal conflicts-of-interest principles to Members of Congress and to executive officials and to provide for disclosure of gifts and outside income.

Until Congress is willing to come to grips with proposals such as these—which go to the crux of the relationship of money to politics in America, not only for the executive but for Congress itself—and until some reforms such as these are enacted into law, rather than languishing unheard and unnoticed in committees, the recurring shrill denunciations in cases such as that of Harry Vaughan or Sherman Adams will, I fear, seem insincere and hypocritical to many thoughtful students of our public affairs.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to include with my remarks a thoughtful and informative article from the Washington Post and Times Herald of June 22, entitled "Some Gifts Always Cost More Than Their Price." The author of the article, Mr. J. R. Wiggins, executive editor of the Washington Post, has tried to place in perspective the gifts and presents which are often showered on personages in public authority and power. I commend his cogent analysis to those who regard this problem as something to be decided by partisan speeches or political invective.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

> There is no gift a grateful constituent can give a public man that will be worth as much to him as the ability to say truthfully that no gift was ever given him.
> Sherman Adams today no doubt would be the first to subscribe to this view. This admonition ought to head any manual describing the ethics of gift giving to those in public life.
> Views on the subject, however, have been almost as many as the men who have held public office. Most official views lie somewhere between those of Thomas Jefferson and those of Ulysses S. Grant.
> Thomas Jefferson paid for gift of Cheshire cheese by the pound, and turned over to the Government the stud fees obtained from an Arabian stallion given him by a foreign government. General Grant accepted almost anything offered him, without a qualm.
> Political safety clearly lies in turning down all gifts. It is hard to find a safe and clear line anywhere short of that drastic and clearly discernible prohibition.
> President Eisenhower's statement of the differences between bribes and friendly gifts may be a fair definition legally, but, unfortunately, gifts can be dangerous to public policy in whatever friendly instincts and selfless purposes they originate. And even gifts can have other purposes and objects.
> GRATEFUL GRANT
> Gifts and not bribes, as such, fouled up General Grant who was, by his own lights and by many other standards, an honest man. Of him, Parrington has said:
> "He was a materialistic hero of a materialistic generation. He was dazzled by wealth and power, and after years of bitter poverty he sat down in the lap of luxury with huge content. He took what the gods sent, and if houses and fast horses and wines and cigars were showered upon him he accepted them as a child would accept gifts from a fairy godmother. He had had enough of skimping meanness; with his generation he wanted to slough off the drabness of the frontier; he wanted the good things of life that had so long been denied him, and he was not scrupulous about looking a gift horse in the mouth.
> "He sought out the company of rich men. He was never happier than when enjoying the luxury of Jay Cooke's mansion in Philadelphia or riding with A. T. Stewart in Central Park. * * * He accepted gifts with both hands, and he seems never to have suspected the price that would be exacted of the President for the presents to the general.
> "He never realized how great a bill was sent to the American people for the wine he drank or the cigars he smoked with his wealthy hosts; yet if the wine had been molten gold and the cigars platinum they would have been far cheaper.

THE PRICE OF FREE CIGARS

"In return for a few boxes of choice Havanas, Jay Cooke laid his hands on millions of acres of western lands for the Northern Pacific Railroad. It was the way of the gilded age, and Grant was only doing what all his friends and associates were doing. If he accepted a $50,000 house in Philadelphia, his comrade, General Sherman, accepted a $100,000 house in Washington. Such gifts were not bribes; they were open and aboveboard; it was a free and easy way of the times. What the age was careless about is the fact that it is hard to refuse a reasonable request from one's fairy godmother, and what the general never understood is that if one is President, such a godmother is certain to be a very dangerous member of the family."

No, the distinction between gifts and bribes, so far as the public risks are involved, is not so easily made. Both can menace the public welfare and the reputation of recipients—different as they may be legally and morally.

HARD CHOICE

What is the public man to do? Citizens of all descriptions, old friends of younger days and utter strangers alike, press about him, gifts in hand. They wish to honor the office he graces. They desire to show their good will. They seek to draw notice to themselves. They hope to advertise a product. They are anxious to publicize a good cause. Perhaps some of them wish to buy influence * * * but which ones? What is a public man to do?

Turning down all gifts is not easy. The rejection of a gift carries with it an implied reproach to the would-be donor; it is as much as to say that the sought-for object is influence or bribery. Or the rejection of a modest gift may chill the warmth which ought to prevail between the people and elected servants. Or a stiff and stuffy declination of an accustomed exchange between friends may make public life a dreary affair indeed. Worse yet, the hospitality that would not be questioned in other circumstances may become as dangerous as gifts of greater value.

Perhaps it could be safely said, however, that the danger varies in direct proportion as the gift's value varies; and in the same degree that the donor's opportunity to profit by favor varies. The safest gift is the gift of no intrinsic value given by the citizen who has nothing to gain from governmental favor; the most dangerous, the gift of great value from a citizen who has a greal deal to gain as a litigant or as a supplicant for governmental favor.

The danger differs, in addition, in accordance with the publicity and the secrecy attending the gift. Gifts by groups of citizens and associations of firms probably are less objectionable than gifts by individuals and individual companies.

The White House is plagued by thousands of gifts, more calculated to reward the donor by publicity than to gratify the recipient, and these are hardly open to the objections that lie against gifts of other kinds. Where they are not of great value, however, they often are of such a commercial nature that the dignity of the Government would be better served if they were banned. Where they are of substantial value they may be inappropriate on that ground alone.

The Presidency has another sort of gift with which to cope—that conferred by one head of state upon another. Most of the time, embarrassment on this count can be escaped by making the gift the property of the Nation—as many of the Presidents have done.

There is one kind of gift which surely is not at all objectionable, the gift to be used in public institutions: furniture and chandeliers for public buildings, rugs for public places. The White House has many such fights and they reflect no discredit either on the Presidents who have received them or the private persons who have donated them. Here is one way of showing respect for the office and its temporary tenant that is without reproach.

Can troublesome gifts be stopped by law or by executive order? The idea has been entertained. The statutes, of course, cover outright corruption and bribery as well as gifts which Congress has deemed inappropriate (originating with foreign governments). Perhaps, but not all gifts to public men are as simple and straightforward as those Sherman Adams received.

What about the gift of social standing and prestige? How could it be outlawed? What about the gift that may consist of lucrative private jobs for relatives or for friends? What about the gift which is no more tangible than the expectation of a soft berth after Government service—in case of political misfortune?

Congress has at least been worrying about its own special type of gift—the campaign contribution—and about the favors that Congressmen do to reward past contributions and recommend future ones.

Whatever laws are made or rules adopted, in future as in the past, much no doubt must be left to the conscience of the public man. Appropriate standards, in fact, may not always be exactly the same. Each public man helps build his public legend. His public has a right to insist that his public acts be in conformity with it. And he will feel the reproaches of national opinion as his acts are at variance with the legend, the image that he has helped construct.

Favors extended and received by a Jimmy Walker will not excite quite the same furor as those extended or received by a Sherman Adams.

Fundamentally, in a free and democratic society, the philosophical objection to exchanges of gifts between citizens and public servants arises in the favoritism and discrimination that such a relationship implies. Each citizen, in relation to officials, ought to stand on equal footing; but when one applicant for the attention of a public official is a citizen who has showered him with gifts and the other is a citizen who has given him nothing, there is a plain danger of discrimination.

Gifts, of course, are not the only things that endanger this equality. Long acquaintance, friendship, intimate association, old school ties, blood relation, and a hundred other aspects of life impair the ideal equality of all citizens before the laws and the men who administer the laws.

Gifts, however, are one conspicuous and avoidable menace to impartial administration of Government. They always will be looked upon with suspicion and uneasiness that rises as they increase in value to the recipient and in proportion as the donor is in a position to profit by favor.

There may be other public issues and concerns of great importance from which attention is momentarily diverted by such excursions as those into which the Harris committee has led the country.

This is not an unimportant matter, however. Citizens are properly concerned with the behavior of public men in those areas of everyday life where the common citizen is as good a judge of motives and purposes as the most favored citizen.

The people know, instinctively, that Jefferson was right when he said: "The whole art of government consists in the art of being honest." They are rightly anxious that the practice of the art marks their public affairs.

Mr. NEUBERGER. In addition, the leader of at least one major interest group in our country has indorsed the proposal made by Theodore Roosevelt half a century ago and which I have embodied in legislation. This man is Mr. George Meany, president of the AFL-CIO. In an editorial written for the April 1956 issue of the AFL-CIO American Federationist, Mr. Meany asked:

Might it not therefore, be a good idea for Congress to provide by law for Government financing of campaigns for Federal office, as proposed in S. 3242, a bill introduced by Senator RICHARD NEUBERGER and cosponsored by Senators MORSE, MURRAY, DOUGLAS, SPARKMAN, MANSFIELD, LANGER and HUMPHREY?

If Congress refused to adopt such a law, might it not then consider limiting all campaign contributions to a maximum of $1?

Mr. Meany's attitude is heartening to me, and I ask unanimous consent that his editorial from the American Federationist be printed in the RECORD, along with my letter to him commenting on the editorial, which is dated March 29, 1956.

There being no objection, the letter and editorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MARCH 29, 1956.

Mr. GEORGE MEANY,
President, AFL-CIO,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MEANY: I was very pleased to see your kind reference to my bill for Federal assistance in campaign financing in your editorial in the American Federationist for April. As you recognize in your editorial, such a step will, in the long run, prove to be the only effective means of freeing our political parties and their candidates for public office from their present unhealthy reliance on vast private campaign funds.

In spite of efforts which are continually made to shift attention to the relatively modest campaign contributions collected by organized working people, your editorial position shows that labor itself recognizes that average men and women can never compete in this respect with the wealth of owners and managers of business enterprises, whose candidates for public office are invariably far better financed.

While I believe that President Theodore Roosevelt's proposal, as embodied in my bill, is the ultimate solution to the financing of modern election campaigns, I have introduced two more modest proposals which could be enacted in connection with clean-elections legislation this year. One of these would make federally paid radio and television broadcast time, worth up to $1 million, available equally to both major parties. The other would permit individual campaign contributions up to $10 a person to be taken as a tax credit (not a deduction from income) against Federal income taxes.

I hope that these two proposals, which are designed to bring more democratic means of financing and more equality to our electoral processes, will also win the support of your great organization.

Again, I appreciate the public-spirited and forward-looking interest which you have taken in the grave problem of election financing.

Sincerely yours,

RICHARD L. NEUBERGER,
United States Senator.

THE LOBBY PROBE

(By George Meany)

A special Senate committee has been authorized to under take a full-scale investigation of political contributions by big business. This investigation was touched off by sensational disclosures regarding the lobbying activities of gas and oil interests. President Eisenhower found these activities so reprehensible that he vetoed the bill freeing natural gas producers from Federal price regulation on that very account.

The AFL–CIO heartily supports this Senate investigation. Despite the law forbidding political contributions by corporations, it is common knowledge in Washington that big business interests have financed political campaigns of individual candidates and political organizations through various legal loopholes.

Frequently these contributions have been made in the name of corporation executives and members of their families. It was not until Senator FRANCIS CASE, of South Dakota, told the Senate he had been offered a $2,500 campaign contribution by a lawyer representing a gas producer, in the expectation that the Senator would vote for the bill desired by the gas lobby, that the scandalous nature of big business influence upon the legislative process was brought forcibly to public attention.

Since the Senate investigation was authorized, it has been stated in the press that the committee would inquire into political contributions by labor organizations as well as big business. One of the committee members, Senator BARRY GOLDWATER, of Arizona, has publicly announced that he will insist that the investigation be broadened to include unions.

Labor welcomes such an investigation. The AFL–CIO, in accordance with the law, files with Congress a complete record of all funds it receives in $1 voluntary political contributions from its members and all expenditures from those funds. There is nothing secret in these activities, which are completely open and aboveboard.

Before the merger both the AFL and CIO maintained separate political committees which collected campaign contributions from members and made expenditures in behalf of candidates from both parties who received labor endorsements. Since the merger the AFL–CIO has established the committee on political education to carry on the same work.

We are proud of the records of these committees. With the help of State organizations, they have endorsed candidates for public office with outstanding records of public service.

Perhaps an attempt will be made to indicate that labor's campaign contributions to candidates, in the aggregate, matched those of business contributors. Such efforts will be doomed to failure, because the fact is that labor has never succeeded in raising by voluntary contributions more than a small fraction of the total amounts expended in any campaign.

It is to the best interests of democracy that the cost of campaigns be financed by as many voters as possible, because this helps to arouse the political consciousness and responsibility of the great masses of the American electorate. It is also obviously in the national interest to prevent a few large campaign contributors from dominating the selection and election of candidates for public office.

Might it not, therefore, be a good idea for Congress to provide by law for Government financing of campaigns for Federal office, as proposed in S. 3242, a bill introduced by Senator RICHARD NEUBERGER and cosponsored by Senators MORSE, MURRAY, DOUGLAS, SPARKMAN, MANSFIELD, LANGER, and HUMPHREY? If Congress refuses to adopt such a law, might it not then consider limiting all campaign contributions to a maximum of $1?

Mr. NEUBERGER. I also ask unanimous consent that a report by the distinguished newsman, Roscoe Drummond, which appeared in the Oregon Journal of Portland, of June 11, 1958, be printed in the RECORD, along with an editorial from the New York Daily News of June 13, 1958, entitled "Gander Wants No Sauce." In addition, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD excerpts from the news broadcast of Mr. Eric Sevareid, the well-known news analyst on June 11, 1958. I further ask to include, from the Oregon Journal of June 16, 1958, an editorial entitled "Legislation Not the Answer."

There being no objection, the articles and editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BILL WOULD HAVE CONGRESS TAKE DOSE OF OWN MEDICINE

(By Roscoe Drummond)

WASHINGTON.—Senator RICHARD L. NEUBERGER, Democrat of Oregon, may not be adding to his popularity with his colleagues, but he is taking a step which can help the whole Federal Government.

In a bill he is introducing in the Senate this afternoon, Senator NEUBERGER is putting this simple and reasonable proposition to the Members of Congress: Take your own medicine—or else.

This all has to do with conflict of interest and that complex of laws designed to keep public officials from having private interests which could conflict with their public duty.

You will recall with what zest, virtue, even smugness Senate committees cross-examine executive appointees to see if their ownership holdings might at some time under some circumstances unduly influence a decision this official might be called upon to make. And if the mood of the Senate committee is that he better sell his stock, he better sell it whatever the effect on his company or on himself—or he will be off to a bad start.

But, somehow, during all these years of eagerly applying the conflict of interest law to others, members of Congress have never applied it to themselves.

Senator NEUBERGER rightly asks: Why not?

The case for applying the conflict of interest statutes to Congress is unexceptionable.

If a Defense Department official shouldn't make contracts with a company in which he has stock, should a Senator be free to make laws for a business in which he has an interest?

But he is free to do so—and he does.

Recently a Defense official was raked over the coals because, having something to do with ordering military uniforms, it was found that his wife was engaged in manufacturing uniforms. There are wives of Members of Congress who are engaged in business on which their husbands legislate.

Nothing is done about that.

A member of the Federal Communications Commission must not own radio or TV stock because he regulates the industry, but members of the Senate and House Committees on Interstate Commerce, in charge of legislation for the industry, can own radio and TV stock.

The congressional "conflict of interest" is almost unending.

Members of Congress are engaged in the oil business and they vote legislation giving special tax provisions to the oil industry.

The are engaged in farming and they vote on farm subsidies.

They take legal fees from the railroads and legislate on railroads.

They are publishers and they vote on second-class postal rates for their publications.

They are lecturers and they take lecture fees from groups who are affected by their legislation.

They are lawyers and they make money from a wide range of clients who have a stake in legislation.

There is plenty of "conflict of interest" among Members of Congress. If conflict of interest can be guarded against by law—as Congress evidently thinks it can in the executive branch of Government—ought it not to be similarly guarded against in the legislative branch?

That's what Senator NEUBERGER is asking. It will be revealing to see how the Senate and House respond.

"I hold no brief for these existing conflict of interest statutes, which have been subjected to much criticism," Mr. NEUBERGER points out. "My immediate purpose is only to present the principle of equal treatment for elected and appointed officers of our Government and I do not wish to complicate this by simultaneously rewriting the existing rules."

In this area of "conflict of interest" it seems elemental that all ought to take the same medicine. If, for any reason, Congress is not prepared to take its own medicine, it ought to change the prescription.

GANDER WANTS NO SAUCE

To the surprise of few if any, Washington dopesters give Senator RICHARD L. NEUBERGER's conflict-of-interest bill little chance of passing Congress.

The Oregon Democrat points out that officials in the Government's executive branch have to get rid of any business connections which might influence their official acts—remember former Defense Secretary Charles E. Wilson's General Motors stocks that he had to unload?

NEUBERGER'S RIGHT, BUT—

So, NEUBERGER, on the theory that what's sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander, has introduced a bill requiring Members of Congress to part company with stocks, properties, businesses, law clients, and so on, that might influence their votes.

He's right, of course; but if this gander consents to be garnished with this sauce, a near-miracle will have come to pass.

CBS RADIO NEWS ANALYSIS FOR JUNE 11, 1958

(By Eric Sevareid)

Good evening. Henry Adams once wrote that people are always being deceived by the illusion that power in the hands of friends is an advantage to them. Mr. Sherman Adams, of the White House, has power in his hands, probably as much practical political power as anybody in the Capital. And he is the friend of Mr. Bernard Goldfine, of Boston, a man with various business irons in various fires. Question: Has Mr. Goldfine's friendship with Mr. Adams been an advantage to Mr. Goldfine, beyond the natural joys of friendship for its own sweet sake? Mr. Goldfine's lawyers say "No." Mr. Adams will say "No." Mr. Hagerty says Mr. Adams enjoys the President's confidence. The House subcommittee counsel implies that the hotel suites occupied by Mr. Adams, at, it says, Mr. Goldfine's expense, indicate that the answer to the question is, "Yes." The Capital awaits proof, whether or not Henry Adams' maxim pertains in this case.

Right in the middle of all this, just as everybody is bracing himself for another congressional "orgy of morality," as Swinburne put it—(very handy thing, Bartlett's Quotations)—right in the middle of it all, Oregon's Senator NEUBERGER has committed something akin to booing the preacher. Mr. NEUBERGER seems to have a simple, logical mind, which will get him nowhere in politics.

He has raised a simple, logical point as shattering as that of the child who pointed out that the emperor had no clothes. How, he is saying, can Congressmen tear the liver and lights out of administration officials for mixing up their private business and their public duties, when Congressmen themselves do this all the time—dozens of them? The Senator is introducing a bill to apply the conflict-of-interest laws to Senators and Members of the House.

For, as Mr. Roscoe Drummond recalls for us, Congressmen who own oil and gas wells are always voting on oil and gas legislation; Congressmen who own newspapers vote on the postal-rate laws; Congressmen with farms devise and vote on farm subsidies, and so it goes. It's the old question—who's watching the watchmen? Congressmen, when pressed, usually answer this by declaring that the voters, the good people of the great State of, have passed upon their moral character, and there is no higher earthly judge. But somehow this sounds a bit weak.

Well, maybe Mr. NEUBERGER should go further and submit another bill (it will have about as much chance of passage as his present one), a bill based on the recommendation of the New York publisher, Mr. Alfred Knopf. For some weeks, Mr. Knopf has been proposing a permanent standing committee of leading citizens to investigate Congress; they wouldn't have the power of subpena, of course, unless Mr. NEUBERGER could fix that, but if they do things the way congressional committees often do things, they could have great fun leaking accusations to the press and great fun watching the accusee trying to make his denial catch up with the accusation.

This is Eric Sevareid in Washington.

LEGISLATION NOT THE ANSWER

We're not sure just what Senator RICHARD NEUBERGER had in mind when he introduced a bill which would apply the conflict-of-interest principle to Members of Congress.

It is doubtful Senator NEUBERGER believes his bill will become law—at least not at this session. If, however, his idea was to call to attention the double standard which Congress maintains on this issue and to spotlight some of the incongruities in the matter, then his mission already is accomplished.

Conflict-of-interest laws are those designed to prevent private interests of public officials from conflicting with the public duty which they are sworn to perform.

Roscoe Drummond, Journal columnist, recently noted "with what zest, virtue even smugness Senate committees cross-examine Executive appointees to see if thier ownership holdings might at some time under some circumstances unduly influence a decision this official might be called upon to make."

At the same time he also noted that congressional conflict of interest is almost unending—Members who are engaged in the oil business who vote legislation giving special tax provisions to the oil industry, Members engaged in farming who vote on farm subsidies, Members who take legal fees from railroads and legislate on railroads and so on.

Then he asks why, if conflict of interest can be controlled by law, as Congress apparently thinks it can in the executive branch, it should not also be guarded in the legislative branch.

The question is perfectly legitimate. Conflict of interest has no more justification in Congress than it does on the Federal Communications Commission, the Defense Department, or other executive office.

But we doubt whether the answer to the problem lies in the field of legislation. If a Congressman or an executive-department appointee has it within him to use his position to further his personal interests, or those of his friends or clients in contravention of his sworn duty, then he will be a poor appointee or Congressman whether or not there is a conflict-of-interest law on the statute books.

The vigilant Senators required Charles E. Wilson, former Secretary of Defense, to dispose of his General Motors stock because that corporation had and was eligible for additional defense contracts. Yet the same Senators did not require Neil McElroy, former president of Procter & Gamble, to dispose of his stock in that corporation. Are the good Senators suggesting that members of our Armed Forces no longer take baths?

The problem is not unlike that involved in the picking of a jury. In the eyes of some attorneys, an unprejudiced juror is one who has never read anything, who has no friends or relatives, who has never done anything—in fact one whose mind is a total blank at the time the trial starts. We pray that our fate never rests in the hands of such a juror.

There are some rather obvious examples of what should not be done. We would not, for example, have appointed the late Al Capone to head up the FBI. Probably a broker of television stations would be better left off the Federal Communications Commission, and we would think it poor policy to appoint an avowed enemy of public power to a power agency.

But leaving aside the extremes, the conflict-of-interest laws fall into the category of attempts to achieve morality and ethical conduct through legislation. It can't be done.

Appoint and elect the best men available and then watch them like a hawk. No law will ever take the place of public vigilance.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NEUBERGER. I am happy to yield.

Mr. CLARK. I commend the Senator for the thought-provoking address he has just delivered, and I wish to associate myself with the sentiments he has expressed—and particularly to view with some alarms the failure of Members of Congress to understand the very difficult position in which they place themselves when they carry on, before governmental bureaus, many of the same activities which cause them to complain about Mr. Adams. I wonder if the Senator would not agree with me that the biblical injunction about the mote in our brother's eye and the beam in our own would be a good text for our colleagues, both in the other body and in the Senate, to consider in connection with this subject.

Mr. NEUBERGER. I could not agree more fully with the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania, who, I may add, is my only present cosponsor in connection with Senate bill 3979, to apply equal-conflict-of-interest principles to Members of Congress and to executive officials generally. I particularly welcome the Senator's comments.

Mr. CLARK. As I understand, there is a rule of the Senate which calls upon a Member to reveal a conflict-of-interest, and therefore disqualify himself from voting, or, in the alternative, at least to reveal such interest before he casts his vote. Is the Senator aware of such a rule?

Mr. NEUBERGER. I am aware that there is such a rule; but it is my understanding that, with respect to most, if not all, of us, it is honored much more in the breach than in the observance thereof.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator is correct. I recall my astonishment, as a new Senator, at hearing the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], when the postal rate bill was under discussion, state to the Senate that because he owned a newspaper in Virginia he was disqualifying himself from voting on that measure, which affected the postal rates paid by newspapers. I thought that was a fine thing for Senator BYRD to do. I had not appreciated until then that there was such a rule in the Senate; but I do not recall any other instance in the past 2 years in which it has been applied.

Mr. NEUBERGER. I, too, share the admiration of the Senator from Pennsylvania for what the senior Senator from Virginia did. I should like to add a further thought. We seem to have set up a double standard of morality in American politics. Let me explain what I mean. It is regarded as sinful, for example, for Sherman Adams to have accepted a rug from Mr. Goldfine. I do not support that action. I do not defend it. I believe that Mr. Adams showed great indiscretion, and certainly very poor judgment, when he accepted such gifts. Apparently it would have been perfectly legal if Mr. Goldfine had given $50,000 to the campaign fund of Sherman Adams' master, President Eisenhower, when he ran for President of the United States.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator from Oregon has pending a bill which would remedy the situation with respect to campaign contributions and put them on a better basis, by allowing a tax credit for small campaign contributions. The Senator feels—and I share his views—that that would make it unnecessary, as a practical matter, to raise very large sums for campaign expenditures from wealthy individuals.

Mr. NEUBERGER. There can be no question about that. The bill referred to is pending in committee. I am also the author of a proposal under which the Federal Government would underwrite campaign expenditures, as President Theodore Roosevelt requested in a message to Congress in 1907.

I wish to conclude by emphasizing one particular inconsistency, which seems to me to be the root of much of the corruption in American politics. It is possible for Congress to become terribly exercised about a deepfreeze to Colonel Vaughan, under the Truman administration, and about a rug and hotel suites for Sherman Adams under the Eisenhower administration. Yet William S. White, the author of a definitive book on the United States Senate, has written that it takes approximately $200,000 in a campaign fund to elect a Senator in an average State, and a million dollars in a populous State.

So long as we permit these huge campaign funds in American politics, to which big business and big industry and trade-union educational funds can contribute, it seems to me that when we become excited over trivial things, we are to repeat swatting at flies instead of draining the swamp.

Mr. CLARK. That is correct. I agree thoroughly with the Senator. I believe he knows that there is pending before the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service on which we both serve, a bill which has passed the House of Representatives, and which proposes to establish a code of ethics for Government employees. I do not know at the moment whether the code mentions elected public officials. I wonder whether the Senator would give some thought to whether we might interest our colleagues on that committee to report a bill, with suitable amendments, on that subject, before Congress adjourns at this session.

Mr. NEUBERGER. I believe we should work toward that end. One reason the bill has not moved thus far in committee is that it does not contain any enforcement provisions. In other words, it is toothless, as only a mere statement of principles. As I understand, it applies to the lesser bureaucrats, rather than persons in higher positions. It should contain some enforcement clauses.

Mr. CLARK. I suspect that the Senator agrees with me that that kind of long range governmental reform takes several sessions of Congress to bring about. I hope that my good friend from Oregon will still be here when the reforms which he espouses with such logic and persuasion, become law. I commend him for his interest in this subject, and I point out again that, although it may take a long time to accomplish such reforms, we should nevertheless start somewhere.

Mr. NEUBERGER. I thank the Senator. I believe he has made a chronological underestimate with respect to the time element involved. It was in 1907, over a half century ago, that Theodore Roosevelt, one of our most vigorous and illustrious Presidents became concerned about the dominance of campaign funds in American political life. That was before the days of radio and television and the other mass media of communications.

Mr. CLARK. That was before Cadillacs, too.

Mr. NEUBERGER. I do not know if it was before Cadillacs or vicuna coats, but certainly it was before the day of multi-million-dollar campaign funds. That was 51 years ago. Nevertheless, this proposal, which originated with a great President, whose centennial we are celebrating, still languishes in committee and still has not come to life. The recent episode concerning Sherman Adams should give Congress the impetus, once and for all, to banish the importance and the dominance of large political campaign contributions in American public life.

Mr. CLARK obtained the floor.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JORDAN in the chair). The Senator will state it.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Is the Senate still proceeding with the transaction of morning business? We have had 2 speeches now, which have lasted for 45 minutes, when we are supposed to be operating under the 3-minute rule. Are we still operating under the heading of morning business?

Mr. CLARK. The Senator from Pennsylvania had no intention of violating the 3-minute rule.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I have addressed a parliamentary inquiry to the Chair. The junior Senator from Virginia must attend in another place and his opportunity to speak to the Senate is limited.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The previous speaker was speaking for a longer period under unanimous consent.

Mr. ROBERTSON. If the Senator who is about to speak will limit himself to the 3-minute rule, I have no objection. I call attention to the fact that the previous speakers took 45 minutes.

Mr. CLARK. I should like to point out to the distinguished Senator from Virginia that the junior Senator from Oregon, who was the preceding speaker, obtained unanimous consent to speak for an additional 10 minutes. I believe he did not exceed the additional time limit.

Mr. NEUBERGER. That is correct. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STENNIS] also obtained unanimous consent to speak for a longer time.

PROPOSED HOUSING ACT OF 1958

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, the proposed Housing Act of 1958 will be before the Senate within a few days. This bill has been painstakingly put together under the leadership of the eminent junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN], whose position as a housing expert is unparalleled in this body. It has been one of my greatest pleasures as a new Senator to explore this complicated field under his leadership and guidance.

The bill is a complex one. It is, perhaps, most complex in the fundamental changes made in the public housing program in an effort to revive a program which is needed more than ever, but which has been gradually dying in the past few years. Testimony before our subcommittee indicated very strongly that public housing was dying from strangulation with redtape and from suffocation under the tight controls of a Washington bureaucracy.

Perhaps the best brief guide to an understanding of this bill is an address delivered last night by the able Senator from Alabama before the National Housing Conference here in Washington. I ask unanimous consent to incorporate in the RECORD as a part of my remarks the text of the Senator's address and commend it for the study of my colleagues.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I am again honored by your invitation to address the Annual Convention of the National Housing Conference.

It has been my privilege to address you many times. Usually, your annual meeting takes place at a critical stage of the legislative year. This year is no exception. Only last Thursday, I reported a Banking and Currency Committee bill to the Senate. It is now on the Senate Calendar and will be debated in the near future. If enacted, it will become the Housing Act of 1958. If its major provisions are retained—and I am hopeful they will be—this year's housing act will be one of the most fundamental, and far reaching, enactments in many years.

The committee bill is, in my judgment, sound in its basic policy direction, and eminently practical in its approach. Its general purpose is to take another step forward toward achieving the policy, set forth in the Housing Act of 1949, of decent housing for all of our people.

The bill is practical in its approach, for it depends primarily on local initiative and responsibility.

Another way of describing the theme of this year's bill is that it attempts to cut redtape, and decentralize Federal housing programs, wherever feasible.

The present status of housing has both its encouraging and discouraging aspects.

The Census Bureau reported over 1 million new nonfarm households formed in 1957. This compares with the production of less than 1 million new homes for the same period. This means that we are still losing ground in trying to meet the needs of a growing Nation.

Moreover, on the qualitative side, the Census Buerau reported the continuing existence of 13 million substandard dwelling units in the United States—roughly one-fourth of the total inventory. A generation ago, one-third of the Nation was ill-housed. Today, one-fourth of the Nation is ill-housed. This slight improvement should give little comfort to the wealthiest and most powerful Nation on earth.

Faced with these realities, it is imperative that more and more people at the grassroots become aware of the basic need for good housing programs, that they speak out in loud and clear voices. Dedicated organizations like yours offer a medium for this important task. It is to the great credit of your own National Housing Conference that it has contributed so much to better housing for America's less fortunate families.

When all is said and done, the realization of the need, coupled with a spirit of dedication to do something about it, constitute the ingredients of success in influencing national policy.

The committee bill now on the calendar is not the first housing bill this year. Earlier this year, you will recall, the Congress enacted, with bipartisan support—in fact, with only one lonely dissenting voice—an antirecession housing measure.

The results have been very encouraging. FHA applications for insurance and VA requests for appraisal have increased rapidly. Even the building industry itself seems a little surprised at the success of the program. The main reason why it went through Congress, in record time, and has since done such a good job, is that it is based upon what I believe is sound policy. The entire bill was directed at the great unmet market for low- and medium-priced homes. As you know, this is an old and familiar tune I have been playing for some time.

I still do not understand, however, why the President is so troubled by congressional action in the field of housing. Despite the speed and unanimity with which the Congress adopted the emergency housing bill, the President waited until the 11th hour before he signed it; and in signing it, he voiced extensive objections to its main features. Now that the beneficial results of the Emergency Housing Act are becoming evident, I hope the White House will concede that the Congress has some understanding of the Nation's housing needs.

I have been somewhat amused by that part of the press which originally attacked the emergency housing bill, but now that it has worked so well, call it a statesmanlike administration act.

The bill now on the Senate Calendar is also a good bill, and it deserves the same kind of bipartisan support accorded the Emergency Housing Act.

The Subcommittee on Housing, after long and serious discussion, assembled an omnibus bill. In general terms, the bill has these objectives:

It would make a long-term commitment toward the support of urban renewal.

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE 84th CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION

Vol. 102 WASHINGTON, TUESDAY, MARCH 6, 1956 3534

EQUALITY IN CAMPAIGN CONTRIBUTIONS IS PARALLEL WITH EQUALITY IN VOTING

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, the bill introduced by the distinguished majority leader [Mr. JOHNSON] and many other Senators, S. 3308, to modernize the Federal election and corrupt practices laws, includes several forward-looking provisions. Among them is a proposal which has recently gained rather wide attention and favor—a proposal to permit political contributions up to the amount of $100 to be taken as income tax deductions in any one tax year. In other words, Mr. President, the proposal is that each individual taxpayer who contributes toward the election campaign of a candidate for a Federal elective office may deduct the amount of his contribution from his income in computing his Federal income tax up to $100 in any one year.

The objective of this provision is to offer encouragement to more people to make political contributions, on a modest scale, to the election campaigns of the candidates of their choice. The sponsors of S. 3308 are to be commended for the recognition which their bill gives to that objective. However, Mr. President, I cannot support the method proposed in that bill for providing a tax incentive for campaign contributions. Analysis of the proposal shows that its actual application would be unfair and discriminatory, and that it would, in effect, introduce class legislation into the laws governing our political processes.

This result, Mr. President, follows very simply from the fact that the higher a taxpayer's income is, the more a deduction of $100 saves him in taxes. As the scale of annual income rises, less and less of the deductible $100 contribution would be made by the taxpayer, and more and more of it would, in effect, be borne by the Government—that is to say, by other taxpayers.

I have prepared a chart, from United States Treasury sources, which illustrates this effect of our progressive income tax rates, if the proposed $100 deduction for campaign contributions had been the law prior to the 1952 presidential election campaign, and I ask unanimous consent to have it printed at this point in the RECORD, so that I may refer to it in my further remarks.

There being no objection, the chart was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[1] Approximate. [2] Less than 0.01 percent.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, even a cursory examination of the chart shows the inequities which would have resulted if, for the 1952 elections, the $100 deduction now proposed had been applied under the 1951 tax code. In that year, the lowest tax bracket—for those who had any net taxable income at all—was 20.4 percent. If a man's net taxable income were in that bracket—less than $2,000—a $100 tax deductible campaign contribution would save him $20.40 in taxes. It would therefore cost him $79.60 to contribute $100 to the candidate of his choice.

But his neighbor with a net income of $6,000 to $8,000 would save $30; for if he reported the $100 as income instead of contributing it to a political campaign, it would increase his taxes by $30. And if the president of his firm has a net taxable income of $50,000 to $60,000, he actually would pay only $25 of his own $100 contribution, while the Government would be contributing $75 to the campaign of the candidate he favors.

Does that look like a fair program of encouraging individual contributions, Mr. President? Is it consistent with our fundamental principle of political equality—of one man, one vote—for the United States Government to offer to pay three-fourths or more of a $100 campaign contribution made by a wealthy individual, and 20 percent of the same contribution made by a person of modest income—or zero percent, if the individual has no net taxable income?

STRANGE WAY TO ENCOURAGE SMALL INDIVIDUAL CONTRIBUTIONS

If this plan is designed to encourage the making of large masses of small, individual contributions to election campaigns, it is a curious way to go about it, Mr. President. For let us look at the chart to ascertain the numbers of taxpayers involved.

Over 17½ million people—21 percent—who filed returns in 1951 owed no taxes whatever; their deductions were already more than their taxable income. The proposed $100 deduction, if they could make a campaign contribution of that size, would save them not one nickel. Fifty-seven million taxpayers—67 percent—were in the 20.4 percent bracket. Adding the next two brackets, we find that more than 98 percent of all taxpayers filing returns would save $27 or less if they could deduct a $100 campaign contribution from their taxable income. As a practical matter, few of them would save that much—first, because the great majority of our men and women cannot afford a $100 political contribution from their family budgets, even if it costs them "only" $80; and second, because they would not be permitted to take the proposed deduction in addition to the standard deduction on our income tax forms. In 1951, about 78 percent of all tax returns—almost all in the lowest brackets—took this standard deduction. Only the minority in the higher brackets, who itemize their deductions, would thus benefit at all from the proposed deduction for campaign gifts.

But the wealthiest 2 percent of our population, Mr. President—and I might add, the 2 percent most able today to make substantial campaign contributions—would have the first $100 of their political donations subsidized by the Government to the tune of $40 or $60 or $80, as shown in columns 3 and 4 of the chart.

POLITICAL ABSURDITY IN "ALWAYS-ALWAYS" LAND

Mr. President, I am confident that upon study and reflection, the proponents of the $100 deduction for political campaign gifts will themselves see the inequity of this proposition. But the plan is not only unjust and undemocratic—it is also a political absurdity.

A brief, wholly hypothetical illustration will demonstrate my point.

J. M. Barrie wrote of Never-Never Land. This was in his Peter Pan tales. Let us suppose, Mr. President, that there is an "always-always land," in which elections of the Government are contested by two political parties. Suppose that one party espouses conservative economic, fiscal, and social policies desired by the owners of business enterprise, and opposes Government spending for social programs and public works. Suppose that this political party always has the support of individuals of great wealth, of the owners and managers of banks and businesses and industrial corporations. Suppose that the other political party—which espouses liberal and humanitarian social legislation, and Government investment in the continued growth of the national economy—generally has the support of the average, working men and women of "always-always land."

Let us suppose, then, that the Government of this hypothetical country—which has income-tax rates such as those of the United States—were to give each of its citizens the privilege to deduct $100 gifts to political candidates from his income for tax purposes—$200 for a husband and wife.

What would be the effect? Which political party would benefit?

WHICH PARTY GETS THE $100 CONTRIBUTIONS?

We have seen that millions and millions of men and women, with the kind of income earned from working in shops and factories or teaching or operating a small family farm, would not be helped one bit in supporting the political party of their choice. Many of them have no net income, after their other deductions, on which to pay taxes, and the majority of the others use the standard tax deduction and would therefore not qualify for the special deduction for campaign contributions. In any case, Mr. President, men and women who work from 1 to 2 weeks to earn $100 are not likely to donate that amount to a political campaign.

The few remaining individuals of moderate income who could give $100, and who would come within the conditions of the special deduction for campaign gifts, would save about $20 from the special deduction.

I ask, Mr. President, how much in campaign funds will the party of the common people in "always-always land" receive by virtue of the special $100 deduction?

But, Mr. President, let us look at the political party which already always receives, from those wealthier groups whose policies it espouses, 2 and 3 and 4 times the contributions of its competitor, in support of the election campaigns of its candidates for the government of "always-always land."

The $100 tax deduction device offers meaningful tax assistance to the campaign contributions of about 2 percent of the citizens—the top 2 percent whose annual net taxable income exceeds $6,000. If these citizens—who can afford it—give $100 to a political candidate, the Government offers to forgive their taxes in amounts ranging from $30 to $80 or more. Which of the parties in the mythical "always-always land" would get most of these contributions?

In other words, Mr. President, under the $100 deduction plan, the Government offers to the political candidates of the wealthiest 2 percent of the Nation, sums ranging from $30 on up in Government tax funds. But that is not all. The tax which is forgiven, and not collected from the $100 contributors, will have to be made up from somewhere else. I do not know, Mr. President, whether the total sum of campaign deductions, and of the resulting lost revenue, will be small or large. But whatever it is, this lost revenue will come from the remaining sources, and what are they? Why, they are largely the income taxes of the less wealthy 98 percent of the citizens—the citizens who, as the chart shows, pay between them 63 percent of all the income taxes collected.

GREAT MAJORITY WOULD HELP PAY CAMPAIGN GIFTS OF WEALTHY MINORITY

There we see the ultimate inequity of the $100 deduction plan, Mr. President. The Government helps pay campaign contributions to the candidates of the wealthier party—which does not need the help—and gets most of the revenue back from the less wealthy supporters of the other party, whose candidates for office are already heavily outfinanced in every campaign. If there ever has been a better device than this proposed tax deduction for making the supporters of the poorer party finance the campaigns of the richer, I should like to hear about it.

Let us return, Mr. President, from our trip to "always-always land" and summarize the arguments I have presented against the proposed $100 tax deduction for campaign contributions. They are the following:

First. It is unjust and undemocratic; for the greater a taxpayer's income is, the greater would be the Government's share of a deductible $100 political contribution made by the taxpayer.

Second. It is unrealistic, for the great majority of American citizens could not benefit from it, either because they elect the standard deduction, or because they have no net taxable income after deductions.

Third. It is further unrealistic and undemocratic, because only a small minority of taxpayers of moderate income can make a $100 campaign contribution in any case, even if they can save $20 in taxes by itemizing the campaign gift as a deduction, so that it only costs them $80—while the wealthier taxpayers who already now contribute $100 or more would have a substantial proportion of their $100 political gift—and that of their wives—paid for by the Government.

Fourth. Finally, it is doubly inequitable, because the revenue loss due to the deductions of these wealthier contributors would, to the extent of 63 percent, be borne by the 98 percent of the people whose modest incomes place them in a top tax bracket of 27 percent or less.

WHOLE NATION SHOULD UNDERWRITE HEAVIEST ELECTION COSTS

Mr. President, I believe in the principle of having the whole Nation share in carrying some of the terribly heavy costs of modern election campaigns. I have introduced a bill to that end, S. 3242, which is cosponsored by half a dozen other Senators. I hope it will be considered by the Senate elections subcommittee, along with S. 3308. But if we are to accomplish this indirectly by tax devices, rather than directly, at least the tax device ought to be fair and democratic and equitable for all taxpayers, without respect to their income bracket.

One such tax device, Mr. President, would be to give every individual a tax credit for the full amount of a contribution to the campaign of a candidate for Federal elective office, up to $10 per taxpayer in one taxable year. In other words, instead of granting taxpayers a deduction for a large contribution of $100—a deduction which may be worth $80 to some taxpayers, $20 to many more, and nothing at all to most—let us grant every taxpayer a credit against his taxes for truly small contributions of $10 each, a credit which will be worth the same to every small campaign contributor, no matter what his income bracket.

I have had an amendment drafted to substitute this device for the $100 deduction provided in title II of the present bill, and I ask that it be printed at this point in my remarks. I am offering the amendment for myself and for the distinguished junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY].

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received, printed, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and printed in the RECORD.

The amendment submitted by Mr. NEUBERGER (for himself and Mr. HUMPHREY) is as follows:

Strike out title II of the bill, and in lieu thereof insert the following:

"TITLE II. INCOME TAX CREDIT FOR POLITICAL CONTRIBUTIONS

"SEC. 201. (a) Part IV of subchapter A of chapter 1 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to credits against tax) is amended by renumbering section 38 as 39, and by inserting after section 37 the following new section:

"'SEC. 38. Contributions to candidates for elective Federal office

"'(a) General rule: In the case of an individual over 18 years of age, there shall be allowed as a credit against the tax imposed by this chapter for the taxable year an amount equal to the political contributions made by such individual during the taxable year to the extent that such political contributions do not exceed $10.

"'(b) Limitations:

"'(1) Application with other credits.—The credit allowed by subsection (a) shall not exceed the amount of the tax imposed by this chapter for the taxable year reduced by the sum of the credits allowable under section 33 (relating to foreign tax credit), section 34 (relating to credit for dividends received by individuals), section 35 (relating to partially tax exempt interest), and section 37 (relating to retirement income).

"'(2) Verification.—The credit allowable under subsection (a) shall be allowed only if the political contribution or contributions with respect to which such credit is allowable are verified under regulations prescribed by the Secretary or his delegate.

"'(c) Definition of political contribution.—For purposes of this section, the term "political contribution" means a contribution or gift to—

"'(1) an individual whose name is presented for election as President of the United States, Vice President of the United States, an elector for President or Vice President of the United States, a Member of the Senate, or a Member of the House of Representatives (including a Delegate to the House of Representatives) in a general or special election, in a primary election, or in a convention of a political party, for use by such individual to further his candidacy for any such office; or

"'(2) a committee acting in behalf of an individual described in paragraph (1), for use by such committee to further the candidacy of such individual.'

"(b) The table of sections to part IV of subchapter A of chapter 1 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 is amended by striking out:

"'SEC. 38. Overpayments of tax.'

and inserting in lieu thereof

"'SEC. 38. Contributions to candidates for elective Federal office.

"'SEC. 39. Overpayments of tax.'

"(c) Section 642 (a) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to credits against tax for estates and trusts) is amended by adding at the end thereof a new paragraph as follows:

"'(4) Political contributions.—An estate or trust shall not be allowed the credit against tax for political contributions to candidates for elective Federal office provided by section 38.'

"(d) Section 6014 (a) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to income tax return where tax is not computed by the taxpayer) is amended by striking out 'section 34 or 37' and inserting in lieu thereof 'section 34, 37, or 38.'

"SEC. 202. The amendments made by this title shall apply only to taxable years ending on or after the date of the enactment of this act, but only with respect to contributions or gifts made on or after such date."

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, if we are to use tax incentives to encourage small, individual campaign contributions from the largest possible number of men and women, my amendment will really permit that to be done, without discrimination among individuals of different income brackets. Note also, Mr. President, that my amendment would expressly exclude trusts, estates, and such fiduciaries, and minors under the age of 18 years from taking advantage of this tax credit.

The substitution of this amendment for the unfair and undemocratic $100 deduction in the present S. 3308 is one of the conditions under which I shall be able to support enactment of that bill. There is another condition, Mr. President, concerning which I hope to address the Senate in the early future.

You may remember that Jack Newcombe of LIFE MAGAZINE is working on a story about you for SAGA MAGAZINE and wanted to see you back in October. I explained at the time that you were too busy to do anything and I have just had another letter from him as per the attached.

Will it be possible for you to see him for a few minutes sometime before January 16.

Dear Dorothy Leffler:

I am back with an old problem on a profile I have been asked to construct on Ed Murrow. As you may recall, I wanted to discuss briefly with him his outdoor interests, his game preserve and farm. But his calendar was full of year-end dates.

On the chance that he will have a few empty minutes between now and January 16--I would appreciate it if you would ask again. I don't want to bore him with dull profile questions but I would like to say hello over a drink or across his desk before I finish the piece.

Thanks for your trouble.

Sincerely,

Dear Dorothy Leffler:

At the suggestion of Palmer Williams, who I believe has spoken to you on this matter, I am writing re an article I have been asked to do on Ed Murrow. It is not for LIFE--although I am in editorial here. It is an outside project for a man's magazine, SAGA, similar to TRUE and ARGOSY in content. The magazine has been running a series of famous and current American men "In Action." They have asked that I do one on Ed Murrow.

The article will, I hope, deviate from previous profiles on Mr. Murrow in its emphasis on his active reporting in the past (e.g., wartime bombing missions, his experiences in Korea) and his love of outdoor life. I am particularly interested in his summer vacation activities with sone Casey, his "preserve" shooting at his Pawling farm, his preferences in guns and game and hunting terrain.

I know that Murrow's schedule is heavy at this time. But by confining our discussion to the above and not re-covering old profile ground I hope the interview would be brief and interesting for both of us. Afterwards I would like to discuss the subject more generally with you. I also expect to sit down with Palmer and Fred Friendly at a later date and straighten out my notes. They are already heavy.

To meet my deadline conveniently I should see Murrow within the next ten days. I work a Tuesday-Saturday week at LIFE, am free Sundays and Mondays and could make most any mid - or late evening dates. I would appreciate your calling me re any arrangements you could set up. Many thanks.

Dear Hank:

I write belatedly to tell you that the time spent at Canaveral will long remain fresh in my mind. It was both enjoyable and informative, and stimulated my appetite for more knowledge in the whole area of missiles.

I am also in your debt for "A Medal for Horatius". I shall share it with a few of my more discerning friends.

I don't know exactly when I can make it, but some time, somehow I will come down and spend that week with you. I am most eager to find an appropriate platform from which General Medaris can make his contribution to the enlightenment of this country. It is a very rare thing in my experience to find a man who is both qualified and articulate and eminently believable.

I shall, as the British say, "make you a signal" when I have made a plan or two.

Dear Ed:

I certainly did enjoy our fellowship down in Florida during those anxious moments while we waited for Pioneer IV to make history. I sincerely hope that you felt repaid for the time you spent on that particular project!

You may recall that I promised to send you a copy of "A Medal for Horatius", so here it is. I think you will agree after reading it that times have changed very little over the centuries. Also inclosed is a copy of the Redstone Rocket which gives a pretty good description of Pioneer IV which I thought might be of interest to you.

I am looking forward to seeing you down here at the school, and I intend to hold you to your promise to come down and spend a week with us.

Please give my regards to "Jess" and tell him that I don't believe the gal from Vassar was nearly as exciting as the launching of Pioneer IV.

Best regards.

Space Probe Will Orbit Sun

Army-NASA Pioneer IV Successfully on Its Way

Pioneer IV, the Army-NASA deep space probe, successfully fired aloft at 11:00 Monday night by a Juno II rocket, today was speeding on its way to pass the Moon and go into orbit around the Sun.

The 13.4-lb. gold plated satellite was blasted heaven-ward from Cape Canaveral, Fla., by a 60-ton, 4 stage rocket based on the Army's Jupiter Intermediate Range Ballistic Missile, developed by the Army Ballistic Missile Agency.

The National Aeronautics and Space Administration said Pioneer IV was expected to pass within 35,000 miles of the Moon (about 221,000 miles from Earth), with its closest approach due about 1:00 p.m. today. Its speed by this time will have dropped to 3,500 miles per hour, compared to the 24,890 mph. speed soon after launching.

NASA officials said the space probe has ample velocity to go into an orbit around the Sun. Pioneer IV will go into a solar orbit somewhat larger and more elongated than that of the Earth it was added. About one year will be required for each trip around the Sun.

U. S. ground stations may be able to track the radio-equipped robot for a distance of 300,000 to 400,000 miles from the Earth NASA announced. It's batteries were expected to last about 50 hours after passing the Moon.

The primary goal of the Pioneer IV space experiment is to extend and enlarge man's knowledge of radiation intensities in deep space.

The scientific experiment, is being conducted by the NASA and the U. S. Army. NASA, in charge of the project, is responsible for conducting a national program of space exploration.

Preparation and launching of Pioneer IV was the responsibility of the Army Ordnance Missile Command's Ballistic Agency at Huntsville, and the NASA Jet Propulsion Laboratory at Pasadena. This is the same team which launched the Explorer satellites and on Dec. 6, 1958, the Pioneer III space probe.

Pioneer III made a major scientific contribution in the discovery of dual bands of radiation high above the earth. It attained an altitude of 63,500 miles.

ARGMA Gets $2.2 Million Contract For 'Little Joe'

The Army Rocket and Guided Missile Agency has received a $2,200,000 contract to furnish for the National Aeronautics and Space Administration a number of Sergeant-type rocket motors which will form the basis for a new rocket to be known as the "Little Joe."

Details of the Little Joe were announced by NASA last week. NASA said the vehicle, consisting of a cluster of four rocket motors, will be used in the early phases of the Mercury manned satellite project.

The motors, variations of Sergeant motors, will be loaded by the Thiokol Chemical Corporation's Redstone Division, according to ARGMA officials. Static testing of the motors will be performed by ARGMA. Clustering of the motors will be NASA's responsibility, not ARGMA's.

Thiokol will also produce small rockets which will be attached to the side of the vehicle to provide assurance that the latter will attain the desired initial acceleration, NASA said.

Little Joe will be similiar in name only to the Army's Little John, a long-range artillery rocket. Little Joe's functions will be scientific, not military. NASA announced the vehicle will be used, perhaps at Wallops Island, Va.,

IT TOOK ALL KINDS

Best Efforts of a Lot of People Accomplished Historic Launching

It required the best efforts of a lot of people, of all kinds of backgrounds, training and specialization to accomplish the historic launching of the Juno II space rocket.

Some of them, only a few, are world-famous for their exploits in rocketry. Most are relatively unknown because their work is performed in secrecy since it contributes to the nation's defenses.

For many of them, this has been a period of fulfillment which began with the feverish acclaim heaped upon the Explorer I earth satellite. That single achievement, more than anything which had gone before, or which has been accomplished since, redeemed the world-wide reputation of the United States and suddenly focused attention upon Huntsville, Ala., and the Army rocket programs.

'Batting .500'

Two more successful earth satellite launchings followed, three other attempts failed. Brig. Gen. J. A. Barclay, who succeeded to the command of the Army Ballistic Missile Agency March 31, was to remark that a ".500 batting average would still win the major league title!"

The attention of the nation's press, the television commentators, the radio pundits, focuses upon the things which come out of Redstone Arsenal — all too often, neglecting to mention that these "things" are created by people, by men and women.

Perhaps this oversight can be attributed to the fact that satellites, deep space probes, and giant ballistic missiles are still so new, so incredible, so fantastic and "out-of-this-world" in concept and performance, that the most acute and well-informed observers are dazzled.

Tracking System Answers: 'Where Is Probe Going?'

Parabolic antenna, modified phase-lock receiving system, parametric ampilifier, and radiometer are all everyday terms to the modern space scientist, who is just as interested in tracking a space vehicle as he is in launching one.

To answer the all important space age question, "Where is it going?", Army, industrial and university scientists have joined to develop improved tracking systems which will receive signals coming from vehicles in the far reaches of outer space.

The University of Illinois, General Electric Corporation and International Telephone and Telegraph Corporation are cooperating with the Army Ballistic Missile Agency's Guidance and Control Laboratory and Research Pojects Laboratory in carrying out this vital research. The launching essentially the same as Pioneer III, and the same general objectives apply, as follows:

1. To measure effectively the intensity of cosmic radiation in deep space.

2. To establish a high velocity trajectory into cislunar space in a further test of guidance and propulsion techniques.

3. To flight test instrumentation designed for possible use in later experiments.

Second Launching

The launching vehicle was the Juno II, a four stage rocket which is based on the Army's Jupiter Intermediate Range Ballistic Missile. This was the second launching of the Juno II; it was first used in the Pioneer III experiment.

The Jupiter booster, for its role as the Juno II first stage, is elongated to increase fuel capacity. This part of the vehicle was developed and fabricated by the Army Ballistic Missile Agency. Atop the booster is a three-stage high speed upper assembly, consisting of solid propellant rockets, which was furnished by the Jet Propulsion Laboratory. The upper assembly is almost identical to that employed in the Army Jupiter-C satellite launching vehicle.

Overall height of the missile is 76 feet. When fueled, it weighs about 60 tons.

Instrumented Payload

The instrumented payload is 23 inches long and 10 inches at maximum diameter. It contains the scientific experiments and communications equipment. Weight of the payload is about 14 pounds, slightly heavier than Pioneer III. The additional weight results from minor changes which are expected to provide better data on the functioning of the instruments.

The principal scientific experiment in the probe will be provided by the Physics Department, State University of Iowa. This is a radiation counter. The University also provided the radiation measuring equipment carried in the earth satellites. The probe counter will measure the intensity and energy level of cosmic radiation.

Also installed in the probe is a camera shutter mechanism which is being tested for possible incorporation in a later probe.

Approximately half of the probe's weight represents a transmitter and batteries. The single transmitter will operate on 960.05 megacycles. This is a change from the normal IGY frequency of 108.03 megacycles and is expected to provide greater range. Transmission will be constant throughout the life of the batteries.

First Seven Hours

During the first seven hours of flight the probe was tracked by conventional ground stations of the Army-IGY networks. This data reported the performance of the launching vehicle and permitted early evaluation of the velocity attained by the probe and its trajectory in space.

At about the seventh hour of flight, the probe entered the range of the giant space communication station of Goldstone Lake, Camp Irwin, Calif. Equipped with an 85-foot "big dish" antenna this station is capable of receiving radio signals from a transmitter hundreds of thousands of miles away in space. Construction of the station was completed in November 1958. The Jet Propulsion Laboratory operates the station.

The batteries carried in the probe were expected to operate for 70 hours.

Prior to liftoff the upper stages were rotated. The speed of rotation was increased during flight. When it enters the cislunar area a special de-spin device will be activated. Small, wire-like arms will be extended perpendicularly from the payload. Spin momentum will be transferred to these arms to reduce the rotational speed. They will then be cut free of the payload and its rotation will continue at a rate of about nine revolutions per minute. This will permit test of a camera shutter.

Purpose of the rotational spinning is to achieve stabilization.

A VERY SPECIAL MISSILE

Here's the History of AM 14

The missile was AM 14. It was given that designation several months ago when fabrication of the booster was begun at the Army Ballistic Missile Agency.

It was a special missile, a Juno II, with a special space mission.

AM 14's booster arrived at Cape Canaveral by air from Huntsville on Feb. 2. Then began a series of several hundred individual tests and checkout functions which culminated in the launching of the NASA Pioneer IV deep space probe.

The missile was prepared and launched by ABMA Missile Firing Laboratory and NASA's Jet Propulsion Laboratory. JPL developed the high speed upper assembly and was responsible for the checkout and operation of that portion of the missile.

Lab Conditions

AM 14 was fired under closely controlled laboratory conditions. During its four-minute powered flight, it was expected to telemeter back to earth 69 separate items of information which are vital to a complete record of its performance.

Liquid oxygen tank pressure, slant altitude, the temperature of engine mechanisms, flow rate of liquid oxygen, mounting velocity time of the various separations, vibration of the upper stages after separation — these are the types of information Army and NASA scientists needed to evaluate the performance of the vehicle.

This is the reason for the exhaustive firing preparations at the Army Firing Lab which stretch into a period of days, and weeks. Missilemen are quick to point out that such missiles as AM 14 are fired under scientific, laboratory conditions. Tactical missiles with military missions are fired under far less stringent conditions.

Dr. Kurt Debus, Director of MFL, was in charge of the checkout and launching of the missile. An indication of the complexity of the firing preparations can be seen from a brief account of a few of the operations.

Erected on Pad

The missile was erected on ABMA's Pad 5 Feb. 4. Vertical and azimuth alignments were performed, the antennae were tuned, electrical and punematic connections were made and calibrations were started on the guidance and control systems.

In the days that followed, a great deal of attention was given to the measuring instruments to assure accurate functioning. The power plant checks were underway. Spare parts — which might suddenly be pressed into service —arrived and were checked out; these were for such missile subassemblies as control computer, program device, and gyros.

The ST-90 stabilized platform, the heart of the amazingly accurate Jupiter all-inertial guidance system, was installed and tested in the missile. The combined gyro-guidance control tests were performed. The calibration of the angle-of-attack meter was completed, and continuing radio frequency checks with the range were initiated.

By mid-February the various possible launching times, down to the second, had been firmly established and cleared with the Atlantic Missile Range authorities. All was progressing well — the preparation of AM 14, which was one of two giant missiles the firing lab had on the pads at that time, was an estimated eight hours ahead of schedule.

Tested by JPL

The Juno II upper stage assembly had arrived and was subjected to rigorous testing by JPL technicians. The payload, both flight and spare units, were satisfactorily tested on the cluster under spin conditions. The heat-protecting shroud for the upper assembly had arrived from Huntsville, and a week before the scheduled launch, the shroud and the upper stages were installed on the booster at the pad, and AM 14 was ready for final systems checks and a simulated flight.

More than 300,000 separate parts are contained in the Juno II space vehicle. During these days of exhaustive checking, a few components whose performance was less than expected were removed from the system and trustworthy replacements were installed.

Finally, at X-3 days, a complete countdown and flight simulation were performed. No difficulties were encountered, and the missile was on time. The next day the last details were wrapped up, and the launch day countdown began without hitch on Feb. 28.

Delay Forced

Low overcast skies, below minimum safety requirements, forced the range to call a halt to the preparations. The next day, Sunday, March 1, was expected to offer better conditions from the range safety point of view. A technical difficulty in the payload forced another postponement.

When AM 14 blasted from the pad to outer space Monday night, everything humanly possible to assure maximum performance had been taken care of.

The heavens-bound Juno II was on her way.

Tracking System

of the latest Army-NASA deep space probe, Pioneer IV, provides the opportunity for further testing of new equipment and techniques.

The International Telephone and Telegraph Corporation's experiment is being conducted in connection with the tracking station operated by the Guidance and Control Laboratory at Huntsville.

14-Foot Dish

The station employes a 14-foot dish (parabolic antenna) with a modified phase-lock receiving system, whic tracks by means of change in frequency of signals received. Signals are recorded on standard tape and graphic recording equipment.

In connection with the system, IT&T is testing the use of a parametric amplifier, a device which amplifies the signals. The IT&T amplifier utilizes non-linear capacitor diods for amplification. Important data regardng the performance of the system is being obtained as it tricks Pioneer IV.

Robert Felsenheld heads the project for IT&T, assisted by Ward Huey. Guidance and Control Laboratory personnel responsible for operation of the racking station are employed with the Radio Frequency Development Section, Instrumentation Branch. Otto Hober heads the Branch: Grady Saunders is Section Chief.

Thomas A. Barr is in charge of the station, assisted by Paul Swindall, William Edens, and Leslie Thomas. Also participating in the project are John Gregory and Ronald Glass, Chrysler Corporation employees assigned with the Guidance and Control Laboratory.

Ga. Station

In addition to the local station, The Guidance and Control Laboratory supervises operation of a tracking station at F. Stewart, Ga. which utilizes a 10-foot parabolic antenna and a phase-lock receiver with standard magnetic recording and digital print-out equipment for Doppler shift measurements.

General Electric Coropration is conducting its tracking experiments at Schenectady, N. Y., utilizing a four-Helix antenna with a specially designed parametric amplifier. Signals are fed first into a double-side-band convertor, which tracks on the side band of a signal rather than on the carrier for better modulation detection, and then into a standard receiver. Signals are recorded on a two-channel tape recorder.

The General Electric team includes A. D. French, project engineer; Dr. J. P. Costas, communications consultant; Roy E. Anderson, and Gunther Fenner. French and Dr. Coast are from the Heavy Military Electronics Department, Syracuse. Fenner, who designed the highly sensitive parametric amplifier, and Anderson are from the General Engineering Laboratory at Schenectady.

Ideal Location

Schenectady is considered an ideal location for "listening to" space probe rockets launched from the Atlantic Missile Range Canaveral, Fla., since there is little interference as a result of the tilt of the earth's axis and rotation, which normally causes blank spots at most other tracking stations.

Meanwhile, at the University of Illinois, a 28-foot dish atop the Electrical Engineering Building is seanning the skies for signals from Pioneer IV.

Signals received are fed through a tuned cavity working into a crystal mixer. The local oscillator is crystal controlled and extremely stable. A radiometer, like that used in radio astronomy, is employed to track at great distances. Data is recorded on strip chart and magnetic tape recorders.

Professor George W. Swenson Jr., and Professor Harold D. Webb are supervising the project, assisted by Richard Sydnor, research associate. Actual tracking is accomplished by changing the position of the antenna to receive the strongest signal. The location of the missile in space is determined by the antenna's position.

Data Transmitted

Data concerning Pioneer IV obtained from these various tracking installations is being transmitted to the Army Ballistic Missile Agency ,where the launching vehicle for the space probe was developed.

In addition to the local station and the Ft. Stewart station, the Army Ballistic Missile Agency operates a tracking station at the launching site, Cape Canaveral, Fla. This station utilizes a 6-foot parabolic antenna, phase-lock receiver, and tape recording system. It is operated by Jim White of the Agency's Misile Firing Laboratory.

Army Now Well Into 2nd Decade Rocket Research

With the launching of the Pioneer space probe the Army is well into the second decade of its intensive research in rockets and their use in outer space.

The Army organized its first rocket battery in 1846. When rifled cannon were introduced in 1860, interest in rocket applications died out in military circles. It was revived during World War I when Dr. Robert H. Goddard, the "father of modern rocketry," conducted rocket experiments under Army sponsorship. The end of the war curbed further progress.

In World War II, Army rocket activity was sharply increased by the formation of a Rocket Branch in the Ordnance Department in 1943. Next year the Jet Propulsion Laboratory, California Institute of Technology, was assigned by Ordnance to investigate the feasibility of developing long-range, surface-to-surface guided missiles.

Activated in '44

The White Sands Proving Ground was activated in New Mexico in 1944 to test rockets.

The real impetus came when the Army brought Dr. Wernher von Braun and his team of 130 rocket specialists to the United States in 1945 and established them at Fort Bliss, Texas, near the White Sands ranges. At White Sands they continued experiments with captured German V-2 rockets. In the Fall of 1945 the first American-developed ballistic missile rocket, the WAC Corporal, was successfully tested at White Sands.

In 1949, the Bumper rockets, V-2s with WAC Corporals mounted in their nose sections, made their appearance. For the first time man-made objects were hurled out of earth's atmosphere. One of these rockets achieved an altitude of 250 miles, a new record.

Made Debuts

During the same year the Corporal and Hermes missiles made their debuts. Redstone Arsenal was selected as the center of Army rocket development. Dr. von Braun and his team moved to the Arsenal.

At Redstone development of the giant Redstone Ballistic Missile began in 1952. This is now an operational Army weapon system. The Army Ballistic Missile Agency was activated Feb. 1, 1956 to develop the Jupiter Intermediate Range Ballistic Missile, the first weapon of its type to be launched successfully in the U. S.

A modified version of the Redstone, called the Jupiter C, was used to launch three Explorer earth satellites beginning with the first on January 31, 1958.

Pioneer III space probe, launched by the Army for the National Aeronautics & Space Administration, attained an altitude of some 65,000 miles and provided invaluable scientific data.

This space probe is designed to obtain further information about the spatial environment; for example, to measure more accurately the band of high radiation detected by the Explorers at extreme altitudes.

THIS GIANT DISH-SHAPED ANTENNA, 85-feet in diameter, was built by the US Army at Goldstone Lake, California, to track Pioneer IV and later spatial vehicles. Its range is now estimated at 400,000 miles. By 1962, when fully operative, the antenna will be able to receive radio signals from space at ranges of 4,000,000,000 miles. The Jet Propulsion Laboratory operates the station.

MERCURY BATTERIES, at left, powered the radio transmitter, cosmic radiation counter and other instrumentation in Pioneer IV. Batteries were expected to operate continuously for 70 hours. At right, the conical shroud placed over instruments of Pioneer IV was plated with gold to improve conductivity. The metal surface also served as the antenna for the probe's instruments signalling back to Earth receiving stations.

THIS IS THE RADIATION experiment on board Pioneer IV. It consists of two Geiger-Mueller tubes and a voltage supply tube (the small tube in the center.) The experiment was suggested by Dr. James A. Van Allen, head of the physics department at the State University of Iowa. Data from the early part of the trajectory, while the probe was in the radiation belt discovered by the Army's Explorer satellites, will enable further estimates to be made as to the energy levels and physical limits of this mysterious radiation.

Best Efforts

Sooner or later, some enterprising correspondent is going to dig behind the rockets and unearth the story of the people — a new kind of people, perhaps, but still very much like other human beings. They buy homes, sometimes; they rent apartments, the exist in trailer courts. Some wear uniform, the majority do not.

Thousands Came

Thousands of them came from Alabama, Tennessee, Georgia, Mississippi, from regions poor in industry, offering uncertain futures to engineers, scientists, and highly skilled technicians.

Other thousands poured into Huntsville from all parts of the United States, from private industry, from universities, colleges and high schools, from training camps, from other Government installations, from research institutions.

What brought them here? What keeps them here?

Well, you can find many answers. Some will tell you it is the challenge of the unknown, pushing forward into areas of knowledge which yesterday were subjects of interest only to science fiction writers. Some will say it is the opportunity of association with that small group of men, headed by Dr. Wernher von Braun, who have more experience in ballistic missile development than any other similar group in the Free World.

Various Reasons

Some looked for opportunity, others for a better life made possible through increased earnings. Some wanted to share in building novel weapons systems to defend their country.

A few, disappointed for one reason or other, have left — most have stayed. They have withstood the usual difficulties of dislocation and moving, a veritable flood of discouraging rumors, attacks by competitive groups and organizations, enticements offered by people who want to buy brains and know-how.

Maj. Gen. J. B. Medaris, their top commander, believes most of them have a common incentive—the desire to be a part of a creative organization which specializes in tackling, and accomplishing, the impossible in the face of almost insuperable odds.

No Counterpart

Hundreds of trades, hundreds of semi-professional and professional talents and skills are represented among the 20,000 military and civilian people who keep everlastingly at their daily chores on Redstone Arsenal. Possibly no other research and development center in the world has such a diversification of human capabilities—certainly there is no counterpart in the Free World.

These are the men and women of the Missile Command, the Ballistic Missile Agency, the Rocket and Guided Missile Agency, the Guided Missile School, the Redstone Arsenal; of Chrysler, and Thiokol, and Rohm & Haas, and of many other contractors, big and small, who share in the tremendous stir of activity and progress which is the sum of it all.

Today they feel the thrill and satisfaction of another "first"—but they are secretly looking forward, with renewed anticipation, to the challenge of the next "first," and the next.

Many

who have dedicated their talents, education, experience, and toil to the field of missilery were responsible for the experimental flight of the Space Probe.

Within the blockhouse a group of scientists, engineers and technicians turned page after page of the Countdown Procedure, performed countless pre-launch relays and operated the instrument panels while the electronic "countdown clock" ticked away each second.

500 Launchings

The man who directs the famed Missile Firing Laboratory team has probably launched more ballistic missiles than any person in the Free World. With more than 500 launchings of research and development missiles to his credit, Dr. Kurt H. Debus has directed the launching of all the Army's big rockets since the first Redstone Ballistic Missile in 1953.

Formerly the chief test engineer at Peenemuende in 1943, Dr. Debus makes his operational headquarters at Cape Canaveral where he serves as one of ten laboratory team members in Dr. Wernher von Braun's Development Operations Division.

Teamwork has been constantly stressed by Dr. Debus who persistently refuses to single out any member of his launch group as "the man who pushes the button." Instead Dr. Debus points out that each step in the countdown procedure carries a significant responsibility. The reliability with which these steps are performed by the team as a whole determines the results of the acid test which will spell success or failure.

Key Groups

Several key groups within the Missile Firing Laboratory contribute to the mission of launching of a huge test vehicle with an experimental pay-load. One of these groups is headed by Dr. Hans F. Gruene. In addition to his position as Deputy Director to Dr. Debus, Dr. Gruene directs the Guidance and Control Group which is responsible for the electrical ground and missile network equipment in the prefiring, firing, and post firing of guided ballistic missiles. Dr. Gruene's assistant, Robert "Bob" Moser, is the scheduling and "countdown" coordinator for the Army Ballistic Missile Agency's missile firings.

The Mechanical Engineering and Ground Handling group under the supervision of Albert Zeiler and his assistant Robert E. Gorman performs all mechanical functions pertaining to the space vehicle from the time it is flown into Patrick Air Force Base until it is fired. This group is also responsible for the fueling of missiles with exotic liquids when required and for the final mechanical preparation of the missile on the pad for firing.

The Data Coordination Office is responsible for the preflight evaluation, reduction and distribution of data acquired by electronic and mechanical instrumentation recording systems as well as data obtained through mathematical computations. The Office is under the supervision of Charles A. Thoman.

The Engineering, Measuring and Tracking group, headed by Karl Sendler who has designed and developed measuring systems and related ground instrumentation, is responsible for the entire electronic field, such as onboard measuring-radio frequency systems pertaining to ground instrumentation and various tracking systems employed. He is assisted by Grady F. Williams who has been engaged in Army missile work since 1950.

Parker's Job

The Program Coordination Engineering Service and Administrative Office, headed by Clarence C. Parker, coordinates all programs, renders technical reports, supervises support and supply actions, checks the safety program and provides research and development photography. Parker is assisted by Don Hardin.

The Military Support Office, staffed by officers and enlisted men, perform duties in the electrical, mechanical and industrial engineering fields at the Missile Firing Laboratory. Many of the officers and the enlisted men have engineering degrees. Among the enlisted men are "Scientific and Professional" soldiers whose educational background enable them to perform highly technical assignments. The Military Support Office is headed by Capt. Kjell Thorstensen whose office also provides vehicle support for the Laboratory.

The Army's Missile Firing Laboratory operates two firing complexes, each with two firing pads, a blockhouse and electronic and optical tracking stations.

The launching areas are adjacent to each other on the Cape's southeast coast area. Each site is equipped with huge gantry service structures which contain the missile through final preparation and fueling. One service structure services two launching pads.

Hangars D and R

The Firing Lab's two assembly buildings, Hangars D and R, house much of the laboratory's total activity. Incoming missiles flown from the Army Ordnance Missile Command in Huntsville, are given exhaustive tests and pre-flight evaluation.

The Missile Firing Laboratory employs facilities for optical instrumentation and electrical tracking systems. Optical instrumentation sites utilize motion picture cameras and several types of tracking, trajectory and ballistic cameras for this purpose. Tracking stations downrange employing electronic and optical instrumentation furnish an accurate and reliable record of the Space Probe's power flight performance.

Hundreds of Industrial Firms Contributed to Jupiter Used in Probe

Hundreds of industrial fabricators and suppliers contributed to the modified Jupiter Intermediate Range Ballistic Missile used as the first stage in launching the Army's space probe.

The Jupiter was developed by the Army Ballistic Missile Agency, an element of the Army Ordnance Missile Command. It will be deployed by the U. S. Air Force.

The Chrysler Corporation, Detroit, is the Jupiter prime contractor, although the booster used in this project was fabricated by ABMA at Huntsville. Chrysler furnished engineering services and some hardware.

Major Jupiter subcontractors are Ford Instrument Co., Long Island City, N. Y., guidance and control components; and Rocketdyne Division, North American Aviation, Canoga Park, Calif., propulsion. For this project Reynolds Metals Co., Sheffield, Ala., built the shell of the rotational launcher.

POWERFUL MAIN STAGE section of Juno II launching vehicle is placed on the launch ring at Cape Canaveral, Fla. Service tower in background, which moves on steel rails, was then positioned alongside the missile. It is equipped with elevators and work platforms to accommodate men assembling the 76-foot tall Juno II.

Modified Jupiter Served as First Stage of Probe

The Jupiter IRBM, in modified form, served as the first or booster stage of the Army-NASA Juno II Space Probe. Fabricated for this mission by the Army Ballistic Missile Agency, an element of the Army Ordnance Missile Command, the Jupiter was topped with upper stages and a scientific payload provided by the Jet Propulsion Laboratory of NASA. The Juno II vehicle measures 76 feet.

The guidance and control systems are located in the forward portion of the Jupiter and provide the sole source of guidance after liftoff. This missile must "think" for itself and adjust to its environment. An angle-of-attack meter protrudes from the tip of the Juno II's cone and resembles an arrow. The meter senses deviations, tilts or changes in direction of the rocket while it traverses the earth's atmosphere and transmits this information back to the guidance and control equipment installed in the instrument compartment of the Jupiter. The meter functions during the first 120 seconds of flight to ensure that the configuration follows its correct flight path.

Guidance and control systems employ gyroscopes and a stabilizing platform for constant alignment. Flight instructions are "read" by remote control into the rocket prior to liftoff. These instructions can, by remote control, be changed up to within 20 minutes of firing.

A guidance correction factor by internal measurement can correct for side velocity of a jet stream, which the rocket might encounter at extreme altitudes, or other side-slipping phenomenon. Gyroscopes control the rocket up to cutoff of the first stage by means of pitch, yaw and roll systems. After separation of the instrument compartment the same gyroscopes provide control signals which operate air nozzles, using compressed air, mounted in the tail of the truncated instrument compartment. By means of this spatial attitude control system, the alignment of the remaining stages and the probe with respect to trajectory is achieved before high-speed stages are ignited.

The Jupiter first stage of the JUNO II rocket employs a guidance system which utilizes the Delta-Minimum inertial guidance scheme. The guidance system, originally perfected by Army scientists for the Redstone Ballistic Missile, derives its name from the system's principal feature. This is the use of a precalculated flight path to which the missile is constrained during essentially the entire propelled flight.

Through simple control action the system corrects for perturbations as soon as they occur and deviations from the standard flight path are small. Even relatively large thrust deviations can be accommodated with no cross coupling between measuring axes.

The Delta-Minimum scheme employs two or three mutually perpendicular measuring axes, with the constraint to the precalculated flight path, which can be with respect to velocity or both velocity and displacement, is applied to one or more of the axes according to the accuracy requirements of the missile.

The Guidance and Control Laboratory, one of ten laboratories under the direction of Dr. Wernher von Braun, Director of Development Operations Division at the Army Ballistic Missile Agency, is headed by Dr. Walter Haeussermann. Guidance and Control wanted to get the angle-of-attack meter out in front of the missile as a refinement to the guidance of the gyroscopic system. The Structures and Mechanics Laboratory designed a shroud device after the Aeroballistics Laboratory provided data essential to determine the best angle for the cone.

The Jupiter was the first U. S. IRBM to be launched successfully. In May, 1958 the Jupiter development team launched and recovered, with assistance from the Navy, the first full scale, heat-protected IRBM nose cone, demonstrating that a practical solution had been found for the aerodynamic reentry heating problem. In July, 1958 another full-scale Jupiter nose cone was successfully recovered.

Calculations Were Begun on Probe Trajectory Before First Explorer

Shortly before the Free World's first scientific earth satellite, Explorer I, was hurled into orbit on January 31st of this year, calculations were begun on the trajectory of the Army's deep space probes.

Initial data from the Future Projects Analysis Branch of the Areoballistics Laboratory of the Army Ballistic Missile Agency were provided in the form of mathematical equations.

These equations expressed the flight of the probe from the earth to the vicinity of the moon and were in turn translated into symbols and fed into the high speed computer by the Trajectories Study Unit of the General Electric Co. under contract to ABMA.

By using these methods of computing trajectories, the Future Projects Analysis Branch was able to determine the amount of weight that could be flown into deep space.

1,000 Trajectories

Utilization of the electronic high speed printer made possible the job of calculating more than 1,000 trajectories. The huge computer requires only 10 seconds to compute a simplified trajectory from the end of the propelled flight to lunar regions, whereas eight hours would be the minimum time for a skilled mathematician to do the same job using a desk calculator.

The more refined trajectories which simulate the actual probe flight from the end of the propelled flight to the moon area would take a person 250 hours to compute. This can be done by the high speed computer in 5 minutes.

The ascending or propelled flight portion of the probe's flight takes somewhat longer due to the influence of earth's atmosphere. The machine requires 20 minutes to do the job which would otherwise require two and one-half years. The machine also corrects its errors during operation. To attempt a similar problem would probably leave man utterly frustrated.

Several hundred propelled flight trajectories and probe orbits had to be run in order to establish a useful grid of cutoff conditions for further final interpretation and choice of the actual 30 trajectories prepared for the different times at which a launching of the space probe might be fired.

Numerous Runs

After numerous runs of a preliminary nature, trajectories were finally established that adhere to the strict limitations imposed upon the final configuration of the missile itself.

From these standard trajectories, many more physical aspects were investigated. Everything than can possibly happen to a missile in flight was simulated on the computer to ascertain the limits at which the missile might be allowed to wander from the pre-computed flight before the command destruct button was pressed. Cutoff of the engine was simulated to find impact points along the flight path.

Finally, after all the possibilities of failure were investigated thoroughly standard trajectories were run from lift-off to encounter with the lunar region, varying standard parameters to determine the tolerance which must be adhered to.

The teamwork of the Future Projects Analysis Branch of the Aeroballistics Lab and the Trajectory Studies Group of General Electric Company has been a important keynote of the project.

Personnel closely involved in trajectory computions are:

For Trajectories Studies-General Electric: Bill Smythe, Chief; Dan Harton, Ralph Roddy and Bill Martin.

Dr. E. D. Geissler heads the Aeroballistics Laboratory.

For Future Projects Analysis Branch of the Aeroballistics Laboratory, were Dr. R. F. Hoelker, Chief; William Miner, Deputy Chief; Otha C. Jean, Art Schwaniger and Pfc. John Schrader.

AOMC Embraces Key Installations In Alabama, Florida, New Mexico

The Army Ordnance Missile Command, the organization responsible to NASA for the space probe project, embraces key installations engaged in rocket, missile and space programs in Alabama, Florida and New Mexico. Maj. Gen. J. B. Medaris is the Commanding General.

The Command is charged with all Army Ordnance responsibilities in the missile-space field. This includes development, production, storage and maintenance of Army rocket and guided missile weapons systems, and conducting space projects as assigned by the National Aeronautics and Space Agency and Advanced Research Projects Agency.

AOMC's resources and capabilities cover a wide range, from prototype production of the Jupiter IRBM, basic research in many areas, test facilities, and the launching of long-range rockets and space vehicles. Fourteen major weapons systems are under its jurisdiction. Annual expenditures in support of these programs are about two billion dollars.

Redstone Is Hq.

Redstone Arsenal, Ala., serves as headquarters for the Command, the Army Ballistic Missile Agency, and the Army Rocket and Guided Missile Agency. Also under the Command are the White Sands Missile Range, and the post command at Redstone Arsenal.

Total personnel strength of the Command is about 27,500, of whom 4,600 are military and 22,900 are civilians. Of the latter, more than 3,100 are employed by Army contractors operating on the installations.

Following are brief statements about each AOMC segment:

Army Ballistic Missile Agency — ABMA, commanded by Brig Gen. J. A. Barclay, is America's first and only Agency created exclusively for the performance of technical service responsibilities for long range ballistic missiles and space vehicles.

This encompasses research and development, fabrication of components, prototype production, static testing and launching, and resolution of logistics support and field maintenance problems.

The Agency, with the Jet Propulsion Laboratory, was responsible for the space probe project, as well as the Army's Explorer satellite series.

Programs Listed

ABMA programs, in addition to space research, include the Redstone, Pershing and Jupiter ballistic missiles. Facilities include, a large twin-vertical test stand, cold calibration stand, blockhouse, development shops and assembly buildings capable of fabricating complete missiles; metallurgy, rubber and plastics laboratories, a computation laboratory and supporting facilities. The plant is ideally suited to the development and prototype production of large rockets,

Dr. Wernher von Braun heads the Agency's Development Operations Division. Development Operations consists of 10 laboratories: Aeroballistics, directed by Dr. E. D. Geissler; Computation, Dr. H. Hoelzer; Fabrication and Assembly Engineering, Hans H Maus; Guidance and Control, Dr. Walter Haeussermann; Research Projects, Dr. Ernst Stuhlinger; Missile Firing (at Cape Canaveral) Dr. Kurt Debus; Structures and Mechanics, W. A. Mrazek; Systems Analysis and Reliability, E. W. Neubert; Test, Karl Heimburg; Systems Support Eqiupment, Hans Hueter.

The present strength of ABMA is about 6,800, of whom 5,000 are Civil Service employes, 360 military, and 1400 contractor.

ARGMA's Work

Army Rocket and Guided Missile Agency — ARGMA, commanded by Brig. Gen. J. G. Shinkle, is charged with development procurement, production, industrial engineering, industrial mobilization, maintenance and repair parts supply and stock control of Ordnance rockets and guided missiles. This includes all Army surface-to-surface and surface-to-air missiles except the ballistic missiles for which ABMA is responsible.

ARGMA is also assigned specified national and support missions for other types of rockets, JATOs and target drones.

The ARGMA organization has directed the development of such Army weapons systems as the surface-to-surface Sergeant, Corporal, Honest John, Little John and Lacrosse; and surface-to-air Hawk, Nike-Ajax, Nike-Hercules Nike-Zeus, and Plato. Some of these are already deployed and others are nearing field use.

ARGMA's work in solid propellants is conducted on the Arsenal by the Thiokol Chemical Corp., and the Rohm and Haas Chemical Co., which operate government-owned facilities.

Major Elements

Major elements of the Agency include three Divisions — Research and Development, Industrial and Field Service — which have the national Army mission in their respective fields; the Ordnance Missile Laboratories, a series of labs which are devoted to research, developing and testing operations carried on within the confines of the Arsenal.

Redstone Arsenal — RSA, commanded by Col. Keith T. O'Keefe, is the U. S. Army installation which is the home and headquarters of the U. S. Army Ordnance Missile Command, the Army Ballistic Missile Agency, the Army Rocket and Guided Missile Agency, and the Ordnance Guided Missile School. The Arsenal, in addition to furnishing a base of operations and all necessary support, also operates the Redstone Depot.

The organizational structure falls under the four major Army areas, administration, security and safety, operations and training, and logistics. In addition there is a control office, directly responsible to the commander and his deputy, a judge advocate section, adjutant and executive officer.

Facilities Supplied

Physical facilities and utilities are also supplied to contractor organizations on the Post including two research companies, Thiokol Corporation, and the Rohm and Haas Company, as well as offices for other contractors having liaison representatives and instructors in missile operation and maintenance located here.

White Sands Missile Range — WSMR is the Army's overland missile test range. It covers a 4,000 square mile area north of El Paso, Texas. Maj. Gen. W. E. Laidlaw is the commander.

Primary mission of the Missile Range is the testing of intermediate range rockets and guided missiles. This includes general supervision and coordination of scheduling, range safety, and instrumentation for all flight testing.

All branches of the military services, plus a large number of industrial firms and academic institutions, are located on the installation. The Missile Range employs about 6,000 civilians and has a military strength of about 3000.

WSMR was activated in 1945, and since that time has served as the principal overland missile range. The first rocket tested was the "TINY TIM" on Sept. 26, 1945. Each service has contributed in the construction of rocket testing facilities. All use the same firing range and to a great extent, the same personnel in firing and instrumentation of rocket flights.

U.S. Entered Space Age Jan. 31, 1958, With Explorer I

The United States and the Free World entered the Space Age on Jan. 31, 1958, with the launching of the Explorer I earth satellite by the Army.

This was the first of several space projects assigned to the Army by the Department of Defense and the National Aeronautics and Space Administration. The Explorer satellite series, and the Pioneer II space probe conducted in December, have contributed scientific data of great importance to man's effort to explore outer space.

Directing the Army's participation in the national space program is the Army Ordnance Missile Command at Huntsville, Ala. A unit of the Command, the Army Ballistic Missile Agency, conducts the assignments using modified versions of Army-developed rocket systems.

Belt Discovered

The greatest achievement of the Explorer was the discovery and subsequent investigation of the Van Allen Radiation Belt which circles the earth. Scientists participating in the International Geophysical Year consider this among the most important findings of the worldwide research program.

Explorer I detected a deadly band of radiation beginning at about 600 miles altitude. The exact nature and intensity of the radiation was not known, but it was apparent that this obstacle could block or greatly delay man's entry into space.

The number of particles encountered per second was some 1,000 times greater than what had previously been considered normal.

Explorer III, launched March 26, carried more sophisticated instrumentation. The radiation band discovery was confirmed and knowledge of the distribution was greatly extended with the more elaborate radiation equipment, plus a taperecorder which made possible readings representative of the total orbit.

New Package

The instrumentation carried on the first two satellites was not capable of distinguishing between the types and energy levels of radiation. A new package was designed, and launched by the Army July 26 in Explorer IV.

These instruments, like those orbited in the earlier Explorers, were designed by Dr. James A. Van Allen and associates at the State University of Iowa. Van Allen, chairman of the Iowa physics department, is a world pioneer in radiation research.

Explorer IV contained four radiation counters instead of the one each carried by I and III. This system of four detectors gave excellent data on the distribution and energy level of the radiation. In order to obtain a wider geographical coverage, the satellite was launched to orbit at 51 degrees inclination to the equator, instead of the 34 degree inclination of previous U. S. satellites.

RESUME OF RADIATION FINDINGS

Dr. Van Allen recently made a report to the American Physical Society on the findings of Explorer IV, covering the entire operating lifetime of 3,600 recorded passes. Some of the main points made in the report are as follows:

1. "The detectors of 1958 Epsilon (Explorer IV), designed with the knowledge of earlier results, have provided a vastly more full and detailed knowledge of the distribution and nature of the radiation. . . ."

2. "We regard it as established that the great radiation belt around the earth consists of charged particles, temporarily trapped in the earth's magnetic field. The rapid diminution of intensity at the lower altitudes is almost certainly due to atmospheric scattering and absorption. . . ."

3. "We propose that the radiation belt is the reservoir whose leakage of particles is the direct cause of visible aurorae. It is further suggested that solar plasma replenishes the reservoir from time to time, working its way into the outer reaches of the earth's magnetic field when its density is sufficiently great, then being trapped in the field.

Pattern Distorted

"On the occasion of the arrival of new batches of gas, the pattern of magnetic field lines at great altitudes and hence at high latitudes is distorted, thus permitting the leakage of particles from the reservoir into lower altitudes at a rate greatly exceeding that which is usual for the quiescent situation."

4. "The radiation belt may well be the seat of a distributed "ring' current encircling the earth; and the pertubations of the belt due to arrival of solar plasma may be directly responsible for magnetic storms."

5. "Also it may well be that steady leakage of energetic particles contributes significantly to the general heating of the atmosphere at all latitudes."

Further Data

(Since these investigations were made, further data of great significance were obtained from the NASA-Army space probe Pioneer III. It was discovered that there are actually two radiation bands surrounding the earth. Radiation in both of these bands is so intense as to preclude a continous orbit of a manned vehicle at certain altitudes without harmful effects on the passenger. Van Allen predicts, however, that man could orbit between the two layers without harm from radiation.)

OTHER EXPLORER CONTRIBUTIONS

Explorer I confirmed man's ability to control temperature within an artificial satellite. Scientists of the Jet Propulsion Laboratory who conducted the heat experiment were assured by results that their technique for temperature control is adequate for the successful operation of sensitive electronic equipment.

The internal temperature was maintained between 32 and 104 degrees Fahrenheit—well inside the tolerance needed to protect instrumentation from heat or cold failure. Outside temperature, measured at the shell, fluctuated between 14 and 167 degrees Fahrenheit. Inside temperature, of course, is easily within the range acceptable for human survival.

In the third area of Explorer I's instrumentation, it was determined that micrometeorites offered no serious hazard to orbiting vehicles. Two wires on the Explorer I erosion gage were fractured during the firing of the last stage; no additional fractures occured during the satellite's lifetime. The impact microphone inside the vehicle registered the collision of several small particles on the shell.

Pictures Used

Visual and photograpic observations of the Explorers are contributing to still another area of science. The satellites were sighted and photographed hundreds of times. These pictures have been used to compute and predict more precise orbital data for other satellites, and are being analyzed to provide information about the earth's equatorial bulge, and anomalies in the earth's gravity.

Two of the three Army launched satellites are still orbiting. Explorer I is expected to stay aloft five to seven years: Explorer IV's lifetime may end in 10 to 11 months. Explorer III, its batteries exhausted and missions completely fulfilled, reentered June 28, 1958.

Some folks want to check government spending and others want to spend government checks.

Son: "Pop, it says here that marriage brings music into a man's life. Tell me how?"

Father: "He learns to play second fiddle."

PROTECTIVE SHROUD designed and fabricated by ABMA technicians awaits the moment when it will be placed atop the Juno II to shield the upper stages and Pioneer IV payload from intense aerodynamic heating encountered as the giant vehicle roared through Earth's atmosphere enroute to outer space.

IN SECOND MISSILE

Several Improvements Made Over First Probe Launch

Several improvements were made in the second Army-NASA Juno II missile, based on information gathered from the first launching Dec. 6, 1958.

Only the close working relationship of the 10 laboratories in the Development Operations Division of the Army Ballistic Missile Agency made these modifications possible in the brief period between the firings.

Close contact was maintained through project officers in various laboratories with Bill B. Greever, an engineer in the Structures and Mechanics Laboratory, serving as overall Juno II project officer.

After First Firing

After the first firing telemetered data was gathered and analyzed, functions of intricate components studied and possible improvements suggested. Feasible ideas had to be placed on paper in detailed engineering designs so that skilled craftsmen in other laboratories could give body and shape. The proposed modifications had to be tested and incorporated with related missile parts.

Successful accomplishment of modifications without delaying the firing schedule is an example of the Army's maxim that inventions can be scheduled in research and development work—and the result of many long hours of tireless labor by employees of the Missile Agency.

To insure at least three additional seconds vital burning time to the first-stage Jupiter engine, the Test Laboratory conducted numerous static firings on the concrete test tower at ABMA. A new arming procedure was adopted for a fuel depletion switch which is designed to cut off the flow of RP-1 fuel and liquid oxygen simultaneously when one is depleted. If one liquid becomes exhausted and the other continues to enter the engine, an explosion could occur and destroy the missile.

New Procedure

The switch cannot operate until it is armed. The new procedure requires arming the switch as late as possible after liftoff.

To improve the accuracy of the upper stages, it was decided to increase the spin rate of the cluster to about 750 revolutions per minute. This required that the upper stages be made structurally stronger.

Electric motors spin the cluster around a central shaft at its base. To make the fast-spinning assembly more stable, and therefore more accurate, a circular track was designed to be fastened inside the walls of the protective shroud covering the cluster near the top of the second-stage ring of 11 rockets.

Six Wheels

Six small rubber-tired wheels attached to the cluster roll around in this ring, turning at a speed of about 7000 rpm, with a surface speed of about 130 feet per second. This is roughly equivalent to an automobile traveling 100 miles per hour.

Fabrication Laboratory personnel began work on the ring as soon as rough hand sketches of the design became available. James H. Chesteen and William J. Franklin gathered parts and material to rush the work along.

Numerous endurance tests were performed by Structures and Mechanics Laboratory to see how long the rubber would last, if it would tear loose from the rollers, and how the shroud would be affected. Personnel worked day and night under the supervision of James T. Sawyer, Structural Test chief, and Robert S. Garrett, test engineer.

Filter Added

The Guidance and Control Laboratory added a high frequency filter to its computer system to prevent noise of the speeding rollers from affecting the signals relayed from the angle-of-attack meter mounter on the nose of the shroud to the guidance equipment in the instrument compartment of the first-stage Jupiter.

This modification and tests to see if the spin motor could carry the additional load were made by Friedrich W. Brandner, Juno II project engineer for the Guidance and Control Laboratory, and D. L. Teuber, engineer.

Work on the shroud required that it remain at ABMA past the original schedule for shipping to Florida. This posed special handling problems for the Systems Support Equipment Laboratory, which sees to it that the missile, liquid oxygen trucks, fuel trucks, and other equipment are in place at the Cape on time.

The Systems Analysis and Reliability Laboratory had to sandwich checks of each modification into its regular schedule of component testing. Project officer here was Shirley P. Hale.

Calculations Begun

More than a year ago, shortly before the Army's Explorer I satellite was whirled into orbit, calculations were begun on the trajectory of a deep space probe. Otha C. Jean, Juno II project officer in the Aeroballistics Laboratory, was responsible for initial data in the form of mathematical equations expressing the flight of the probe from the earth to the vicinity of the moon.

This data was transferred by Computation Laboratory personnel to machine language and fed into high speed computers by the Trajectories Study Unit of General Electric Co., under contract to ABMA. More than 1,000 trajectories were calculated to provide alternate firing times for Missile Firing Laboratory personnel at Cape Canaveral. Tom Yarbrough was project officer in the Digital Projects Branch of the Computation Laboratory.

Speer in Charge

After launching, the Computation Laboratory also evaluated tracking information on the initial powered flight, using the doppler technique to determine velocity of the probe. Dr. Fridtjof A. Speer was in charge of tracking data evaluation. With the assistance of Herman F. Kurtz, he developed the evaluation technique used on this and the first Army-NASA space probe.

The Research Projects Laboratory coordinated the scientific experiments carried in the payload to insure maximum amounts of valuable data on radiation in outer space.

Agency Charged With Probe Embraces Key Elements

The Army Ordnance Missile Command, the organization responsible to NASA for the space probe project, embraces key installations engaged in rocket, missile and space programs in Alabama and New Mexico. Maj. Gen. J. B. Medaris is the Commanding General.

The Command is charged with all Army Ordnance responsibilities in the missile-space field. This includes development, production, storage and maintenance of Army rocket and guided missile weapons systems, and conducting space projects as assigned by the National Aeronautics and Space Agency and the Advanced Research Projects Agency.

AOMC's resources and capabilities cover a wide range, from prototype production of the Jupiter IRBM, basic research in many areas, test facilities, and the launching of long - range rockets and space vehicles. Fourteen major weapons systems are under its jurisdiction. Annual expenditures in support of these programs are about two billion dollars.

Redstone Arsenal, Ala., serves as headquarters for the Command, the Army Ballistic Missile Agency, and the Army Rocket and Guided Missile Agency. Also under the Command are White Sands Missile Range and the post command at Redstone Arsenal.

Total Strength

Total personnel strength of the Command is about 29,000, of whom 6,000 are military and 23,000 are civilians. Of the latter, more than 4,000 are employed by Army contractors operating on the installations.

Following are brief statements about each AOMC segment:

Army Ballistic Missile Agency —ABMA, commanded by Brig. Gen. J. A. Barclay, is America's first and only Agency created exclusively for the performance of technical service responsibilities for long range ballistic missiles and space vehicles.

This encompasses research and development, fabrication of components, prototype production, static testing and launching, and resolution of logistics support and field maintenance problems.

Agency Responsible

The Agency, with Jet Propulsion Laboratory, Pasadena, Calif., was responsible for the space probe project, as well as the Army's Explorer satellite series.

ABMA programs, in addition to space research, include the Redstone, Pershing and Jupiter ballistic missiles. Facilities include a large twin-vertical test stand, cold calibration stand, blockhouse, development shops and assembly buildings capable of fabricating complete missiles; metallurgy, rubber and plastics laboratories, a computation laboratory and supporting facilities. The plant is ideally suited to the development and prototype production of large rockets.

Dr. Wernher von Braun heads the Agency's Development Operations Division. Development Operations consists of 10 laboratories: Aeroballistics, directed by Dr. E. D. Geissler; Computation, Dr. H. Hoelzer; Fabrication and Assembly Engineering, Hans H. Maus; Guidance and Control, Dr. Walter Haeussermann; Research Projects, Dr. Ernst Stuhlinger; Missile Firing (at Cape Canaveral), Dr. Kurt Debus; Structures and Mechanics, W. A. Mrazek; Systems Analysis and Reliability, E. W. Neubert; Test, Karl Heimburg; Systems Support Equipment, Hans Hueter.

The present strength of ABMA is about 6,800, of whom 5,000 are Civil Service employes, 360 military, and 1400 contractor.

ARGMA's Mission

Army Rocket and Guided Missile Agency—ARGMA, commanded by Brig. Gen. J. G. Shinkle, is charged with development, procurement, production, industrial engineering, industrial mobilization, maintenance and repair parts supply and stock control of Ordnance rockets and guided missiles. This includes all Army surface-to-surface and surface-to-air missiles except the ballistic missiles for which ABMA is responsible.

ARGMA is also assigned specified national and support missions for other types of rockets, JATOs and target drones.

The ARGMA organization has directed the development of such Army weapons systems as the surface-to-surface Sergeant, Corporal, Honest John, Little John and Lacrosse; and surface-to - air Hawk, Nike-Ajax, Nike-Hercules, Nike-Zeus, and Plato. The Arsenal, in addition to furnishing a base of operations and all necessary support, also operates the Redstone Depot.

The organizational structure falls under the four major Army areas, Administration, security and safety, operations and training, and logistics. In addition there is a control office, directly responsible to the commander and his deputy, a judge advocate section, adjutant and executive officer.

Facilities Supplied

Physical facilities and utilities are also supplied to contractor organizations on the Post including two research companies, Thiokol Corporation, and the Rohm and Haas Company, as well as offices for other contractors having liaison representatives and instructors in missile operation and maintenance located here.

Completion of MFL Building Addition At Cape Is Due Soon

Construction of a 10,148 square foot addition to the Engineering and Laboratory Building at the Missile Firing Laboratory, Cape Canaveral, Fla., is scheduled for completion this month.

The $195,259 addition, a two-story wing 115 foot 4 inches long and 44 feet wide, has been under construction by Diversified Builders, Inc., since September 1958.

When completed it will house administrative and engineering offices now located in Hangars D and R. The hangars will then be available for the laboratory purposes for which they were originally intended.

Civilian Employes' Injury-Free Period Ends After 91 Days

The disabling injury-free period for Arsenal civilian personnel ended last week at approximately 5,400,000 man-hours and 91 consecutive days when an employee received a severe finger injury RSA Safety Division officials announced. On the following day, another civilian employee was injured in an automobile accident on post which was also listed as a disabling injury.

The injury-free period just ended was the second period of excellent work performance reaching over 5,000,000 man-hours without a disabling injury within the past 12-month period, the other period having been worked last July, August, and September.

Safety personnel urge that civilian employees resolve to continue their safe work performance in order to reach a coveted goal of 100 consecutive days without a disabling injury.

140 Officers Wives Gather for 'Brunch'

More than 140 officers wives gathered Feb. 24 for "Brunch" at the Squirrel Hill Officers Club.

The event, sponsored by the Executive Board of the Redstone Arsenal Officers Wives club, was open to the entire club membership.

As an icebreaker, road maps cut into five pieces were distributed among those attending, one piece to each person. Object was for persons having pieces to the same map to find each other and match the pieces together again.

Decorations were carried out in a patriotic theme in keeping with George Washington's birthday. Tables were highlighted with cherry logs split by minature hatchets and the buffet table featured a bouquet of red and white chrysanthemums, carnations, and snap dragons tied with a blue bow.

The bouquet went as door prize to Mrs. J. A. Myers. whose road map contained Huntsville, Ala.

FOURTH TACTICAL JUPITER LAUNCHED

The Army launched another Jupiter intermediate range ballistic missile over the Atlantic Missile Range Thursday night in continuation of the development test program.

The missile was programmed for approximately full range of 1500 miles.

This was the fourth tactical Jupiter to be launched, and second firing of a Chrysler-produced Jupiter. The Chrysler Corporations Missile Division, prime contractor, manufactures the Jupiters at the Army-owned Michigan Ordnance Missile Plant near Detroit. The missiles are flown directly from the assemby line to the firing site.

Early Jupiters were fabricated by the developer, the Army Ballistic Missile Agency.

Thursday's flight was a routine test of the tactical ballistic shell, 150,000-pound thrust engine, and the warhead and fuzing system.

Key officer and enlisted personnel of the AF 864th Strategic Missile Squadron (Jupiter), were present for the launching. Members of the Squadron observed and participated in the checkout, fueling and firing operations, which were conducted by ABMA's Missile Firing Laboratory.

The 864th is in advanced training at Redstone Arsenal.

Another mission of Thursday's launching was a continuation of the Army's "Operation Gaslight." A ship was stationed in the downrange impact area to record data on reentry of the missiles three sections, the nose cone, instrument compartment and booster.

Information sought included: radiation emitted by the sections, the aerodynamics effects and the shock wave characteristics.

Col. William C. Erlenbusch and Col. Glenn B. Daughton, commanders of the 864th and 865th Strategic Missile Squadrons, respectively, witnessed the launching. The Missile squadrons are in training at the Army Ordnance Missile Command with the Jupiter IRBM.

Mobile Maintainence Officer Capt. Glen M. Mathis, Jr., of the 864th was in charge of a group of airmen who participated in the check out of the missile and in pad preparations.

Master Sergeant Herman J. Schrubbe of the 864th monitored the slant altitude panel in the blockhouse during the launching.

Other airmen who participated in pre-launch preparations were T-Sgt. Ray G. Mehl, Pease Air Force Base, N. H; T-Sgt. Joe A. Huff, Sr., Barksdale AFB, La.; M-Sgt. Francis E. McCown, Hunter AFB, Ga., S-Sgt. Dwight J. Clark, Hunter AFB; M-Sgt. Boyd F. Williams, Lockbourne AFB, T-Sgt. Lawrence Head, Whiteman AFB, Mo., and T-Sgt. Walter E. Spencer, Jr., Carswell AFB, Texas. Chief Warrant Officer James Worner and Maj. Farnk Long of the 864th witnessed the launching.

Gen. Shinkle to Talk At Western Space Age Conference

Brig. Gen. J. G. Shinkle, Commander, Army Rocket and Guided Missile Agency, will speak on "Army Research and Development" at the Western Space Age Conference and Exhibit in Los Angeles tomorrow.

The event, which will be held Thursday through Saturday, is sponsored by the Chambers of Commerce of Los Angeles, Las Vegas, Phoenix, Portland, Salt Lake City, San Diego, San Francisco, Seattle, and Tucson. It will feature 10 acres of industry and government exhibits of missiles, aircraft, ground support equipment, and related components and services.

Besides Gen. Shinkle, other speakers will include such personalities as Erik Bergaust, well-known writer on missiles and space topics; Scott Crossfield, experimental test pilot and design specialist (X-15 test pilot), North American Aviation, Inc.; Maj. Gen. B. A. Schriever, USAF, Commander, USAF Ballistics Missile Division, Air Research and Development Command; Lt. Gen. Arthur G. Trudeau, USA, Chief of Research and Development, Department of the Army; Dr. Edward Teller, director, University of California Radiation Laboratory; Dr. Hugh L. Dryden, Deputy Administrator, National Aeronautics and Space Administration.

Daniel Construction Co. Awarded Contract for Building

The Daniel Construction Co. of Birmingham, Ala., has been awarded a contract totalling nearly three million dollars for work at Redstone Arsenal.

Col. R. W. Love, U. S. Army District Engineer at Mobile, announced that the Corps of Engineers has accepted the Birmingham firm's low bid of $2,949,651.75 for constructing a massive concrete building to provide administrative space for the Army Rocket and Guided Missile Agency.

The building, which will have a floor area of about 208,000 square feet, will consist of three parallel wings, each three stories high, with interconnecting corridors. It will be known as the Missions Engineering Building.

The contract will also include repairing the roof on Vincent Hall, a class and laboratory building of the Ordnance Guided Missile School at the Arsenal, by removing the present wearing surface and installing a new wearing surface of synthetic latex.

The contractor is expected to start work shortly, complete the roof repair work in June of this year, and complete the Missions Engineering Building ready for use in August 1960.

Nominations for Safe Worker, Supervisor Of Week Piling Up

The response to the request for nominations for the "Safe Worker" and "Safe Supervisor of the Week" has been so good that there is a considerable backlog of nominees from various organizations, according to officials of the RSA Safety Division.

Many supervisors and nominees have called to check to see if and when some of those nominated would be featured in The Redstone Rocket. Safety Division officials state that all nominees should have patience and that they will be eventually selected. Since only one worker and one supervisor is featured each week, it takes some time in some cases for nominees to be chosen. An effort is made to pass around the honors to various organizations within the installation."

The safety representative expressed appreciation for the interest in these weekly features.

POWERED, SPATIAL FLIGHTS

Tracking Involved Two Related Time Phases

Tracking of the Army-NASA deep space probe involved two related time phases: the powered flight of the Juno II launching vehicle, and the spatial flight of the probe itself.

The Army Ballistic Missile Agency, which provided the booster stage, guidance and control systems and the protective shroud installed on the vehicle, tracked throughout the powered staging.

This included the functioning of the first, second, third and fourth stages. When the fourth stage burned out, the probe was injected into its spatial trajectory. It then became a free moving body in space. The Jet Propulsion Laboratory, Pasadena, Calif., was to evaluate spatial tracking and communicate its data to the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, under whose programs the experiment is being conducted.

During the initial power flight, Army tracking stations located at the Ballistic Research Laboratory, Aberdeen, Md.; Fort Stewart, Ga., Cape Canaveral and Miami, Fla., received radio signals from the huge rocket.

CLOSE ACCESS HATCH — Missile Firing Laboratory personnel close access hatch on the Juno II assembly in preparation for the firing of the 76-foot space rocket.

Data Transmitted

This data was immediately transmitted to the Computions Laboratory of ABMA in Huntsville. Utilizing the doppler technique, comparable to the increased volume of a locomotive whistle as it approaches and receding volume of the whistle as the train moves away, scientists could determine the velocity of the rocket by the changes in radio signals.

The Laboratory's evaluations were transmitted to Cape Canaveral where Army and JPL technicians computed the performance of the rocket's sussessive stages and estimated its trajectory through Earth's atmosphere into space.

A JPL-operated station at Mayagues, Puerto Rico, "homed in" on the missile shortly after liftoff and as it moved away from the East Coast ground tracking stations. The Puerto Rico installation also received telemetry from the cosmic radiation measuring instruments inside the probe.

Another tracking station located at the University of Illinois was conducting a special experiment to obtain data on the angle of flight.

After 7 Hours

About seven hours after injection, when the probe had traveled approximately 50,000 miles, the giant 85-foot dish shaped antenna at Goldstone Lake, Camp Irwin, Calif., operated by JPL, began to receive radio signals from Pioneer IV.

Goldstone continued tracking until the 16th hour, when the probe was approximately 100,000 miles away and due to the Earth's rotation, had moved to the opposite side of Earth.

At about the 30th hour, Goldsttone was in ideal position for tracking as the probe neared the lunar region. Between the time Goldstone had again acquired the probe and continuing through about the 40th hour, the giant antenna was directly under the Moon.

Dr. Fridtjof A. Speer is in charge of AMBA tracking data evaluation. He performed the same function in the successful launching of the Explorer IV Earth satellite. With the assistance of Herman F. Kurtz, Dr. Speer developed the new evaluation technique. The process makes use of the IBM 704 computers available at the Missile Agency.

The following was the approximate schedule for acquistion and loss of signals at Goldstone:

Acquire Signal

Plus 7 hours - Goldstone acquired signal for the first time.

Plus 16 hours - Goldstone lost the signal as the rotational movement of the Earth caused Pioneer IV to set in the West like a star, interposing the mass of Earth between the antenna and the probe. Although it continued to send signals, Pioneer's voice was not heard on Earth during the next 14 hours.

Plus 30 hours - Pioneer IV rose like a star on the Eastern horizon. Data from JPL in Pasadena, emanating from a 704 computer, compiled during the previous period of acquisition and evaluated when the probe's signals were lost, enabled the big antenna to be pointed at exactly the location in space on the Eastern horizon where Pioneer IV rose.

Plus 33 hours - Pioneer IV passed the moon region while moon and probe were over the Southern horizon at Goldsone.

Canisius College Awards an Honorary Degree to von Braun

Canisius College of Buffalo, N. Y., last weekend awarded an honorary degree to Dr. Wernher von Braun, ABMA's Director of Development Operations Division.

Dr. von Braun was cited for his leadership in science and pioneer efforts in the realm of outer space.

The Very Rev. Philip E. Dobson, S. J., president of Canisius, said such men as von Braun are among those "who regard technological and material progress as a means to the proper end—the achievement of the goals intended for us by God in His creation."

At a civic luncheon, von Braun said that men like himself must re-evaluate their capabilities as salesmen.

He said there was a widespread sense of apathy toward space problems, adding, "maybe we just haven't done enough of the 'hard sell' and have taken for granted that our audience accepted everything we said."

ABMA Teams Calculate Payload's Trajectory

Far from the launching pad at Cape Canaveral, Fla., from where the Army launched its space probe, for NASA, a team of mathematicians is calculating the trajectory of the payload through outer space.

Aiding them in their task is an IBM 704 computer, located in the Army Ballistic Missile Agency's Computation Laboratory which houses one of the largest arrays of electronic computing devices under one roof in the world.

The 704 has been instructed by a complicated program to answer questions concerning the position, velocity, and direction of the probe at thousands of successive intervals of time.

Long before the Jupiter IRBM provided the thrust for the first stage of powered flight of the vehicle, scientists of the Aeroballistics Laboratory had given dozens of sheets of data containing possible launching conditions to the Computation Laboratory. Here the data, along with prepared program cards, were fed into the 704 computer.

Program Cards

The program cards contain the instructions necessary to cause the computer to solve the equations of a body in motion under the combined gravitational forces of the earth, the moon, and the sun.

The program cards were prepared by mathematicians of the Digital Projects Branch of the Computation Laboratory and tell the computer exactly what to do, i. e., multiply, divide, subtract add, store information, indicate errors and in certain cases to make decisions when confronted with mathematical or logical alternatives.

The pre-calculated trajectory has been furnished to Army and IGY tracking stations around the globe so that the payload can be located and tracked in its flight through lunar space.

Coordination between the tracking stations, the Flight Evaluation Branch of Aeroballistics, the Jet Propulsion Laboratory and the Computation Laboratory enables the calculated trajectory of the probe to be corrected to the actual trajectory during flight.

How It's Done

This is accomplished by feeding observations of position versus time into the computer and calculating the deviations necessary to correct the calculated trajectory. Positions at future times may then be relayed back to the tracking stations to enable them to anticipate the probe's flight.

The data received from the stations is first processed and "smoothed" by the 704, using programs prepared by Tracking Section of the Data Reduction Branch.

As early as July of last year, Computation Laboratory personnel under the direction of Dr. Helmut Hoelzer have been computing trajectories based on information supplied by Aeroballistics Laboratory and Research Projects Laboratory.

Digital Projects Branch personnel working on the calculations are Charles Hubbard, Chief; Project Leader Tom Yarbough, and Mathematicians Mildred Letherwood, Frank Besadesky, Joan Kassner and Betty Harrison.

Data Reduction Branch personnel include David Aichele, Chief, Tracking Section, and Mathematicians Paul Hurst, John Lynn, and Fred Rodriques.

My dear Mr. Murrow:

Congratulations on your speech delivered before the National Convention of the Radio-Television News Directors' Association!

To acquaint you with the action taken by the Business & Professional Women's Club of Hickory, North Carolina, I am sending you herewith a marked copy of the editorial page from THE HICKORY DAILY RECORD of January 31, 1959, and also copy of a letter sent to the major networks.

BPW Endorses Analyst's News Interpretation Views

Edward R. Murrow, in a recent speech delivered before the National Convention of the Radio-Television News Directors' Association, presented a strong case for straight from the shoulder news and news-analysts program. Mr. Murrow made it explicit that if our nation is to survive, we must take the news and its interpretation seriously.

The Hickory Business and Professional Women's Club, at its latest meeting, endorsed the views of Mr. Murrow in the following language:

"Whereas, we the members of the Business and Professional Women's Club of Hickory, North Carolina, are a segment of the American people, and as such are affected by any force bearing upon the welfare and security of the Nation, and

"Whereas, the welfare and the security of the United States and of other nations of the world depend chiefly upon the understanding by the people of the United States of the meaning of world events of today and of history, and of the part of the United States Government in shaping such events, and

"Whereas, the radio and television networks of the Nation through their news broadcasts and public forums possess in greatest degree the opportunity to give the people the truth and through selected programs, the opportunity to be an educational force, and

"Whereas, we believe that at present the networks give too much time and talent to equivocal advertising and to entertainment unrelated to reality,

"Be it resolved that we, in the interest of national security and well-being, ask the officers and directors of the major networks, the Columbia Broadcasting Company, the National Broadcasting Company, the American Broadcasting Company, and the Mutual Broadcasting Company, to reduce advertising in relation to news and news-analyst programs and to review and revise entertainment programs featuring cowboys, Indians, gunmen, murderers and bad men generally, and to offer instead more material of interest to literate and mature minds, as recommended by Edward R. Murrow in his recent speech before the national convention of the Radio-Television News Directors Association in Chicago, and published in part in TV Guide for December 13-19, 1958. We also ask that copies of this resolution be sent to Mr. Murrow, to the Federal Communications Commission, to the TV Guide, to Miss Lois Siler, North Carolina Chairman of the Standing Committee on National Security, and to Miss Ada L. Burt, National Chairman of the Standing Committee on National Security."

This resolution was unanimously adopted by the Hickory BPW club.

The resolution was presented by the committee on national security, composed of the following: Margaret Newton, Blannie Kirkpatrick, Lucille Huggins, Minnie B. Burns and Elva Greenway.

REDS SEE GAIN IN CUBAN UPSET

MOSCOW (AP)—A Cuban delegate to the 21st Communist party congress claimed today that the leftwing people's Socialist party of Cuba had a big part in overthrowing dictator Fulgencio Batista.

The party, "working underground, at the price of the lives of many of its leaders, actually launched the struggle for unification of all Cuban revolutionary forces," said Sivero Aguirre, a representative of the National Committee of the Peoples' Socialists.

In First Ranks

"The Communists were in the first rank of the insurgent ranks in Cuba and managed to win full respect of their comrales in arms," Aguirre told the Kremlin meeting.

He declared that the new Fidel Castro regime "has the support of the whole of our people and its experience refutes American assertions that a successful struggle against imperialism is impossible in Latin America."

Aguirre among the first Latin American delegates to speak at the congress, was given one of the longest and loudest ovation's at today's session.

ACRE BURNED OVER

Gentlemen:

For your information we are enclosing a marked copy of the editorial page of THE HICKORY DAILY RECORD dated January 31, 1959.

The Business and Professional Women's Club of Hickory, North Carolina, is in hearty agreement with the views of Edward R. Murrow as expressed in his speech at the national convention of the Radio-Television News Directors Association in Chicago and reported in TV GUIDE for the week of December 13-19, 1958.

It is the sincere hope of our Club that the major broadcasting companies will, in line with Mr. Murrow's suggestions, help fight the battle "against ignorance, intolerance and indifference" and do their utmost to see that the American people receive "illumination on subjects that may well determine the future of this country....."

Bliss — any ideas?

December 5, 1958

Dear Ed:

This is to ask you if you would like to be a contributor to the new "Meaning" series now appearing on the opening page of THIS WEEK Magazine.

As you may know, this page has traditionally been a source of inspiration and fulfillment to our thirteen million reader families. The "Meaning" series has recently developed from unsolicited brief contributions written or chosen by outstanding Americans. These pieces stimulated such excellent response that we have decided to expand the list of contributors and consequently I am writing you in the hope that you may have a particularly "favorite" quotation or for that matter, an excerpt from one of your own works, which would fit into this series.

Attached are some sample pages. The footnote to the starting piece, "We Want Meaning in Our Lives!", tells what we are looking for -- words which, in your opinion, help express the deepest values of our society. Can you think of such a quotation (or is there something you have said) which will really make some important idea come to life and so help people find added meaning and significance in their lives?

The attached pages indicate how such passages will be presented. As you can see, two important considerations are: (1) brevity (100 words or less), and (2) beauty and eloquence of style. If it seems appropriate, we would also welcome a sentence or two of comment from you for possible use in the explanatory note. Our basic guarantee to each selector of a quotation is $50.00, which will be increased to $250.00 upon publication.

This Week
MAGAZINE

I very much hope that you will contribute something for the series and I look forward to hearing from you.

Sincerely yours,

Bill Nichols

I enjoyed our visit the other night! ERM

Thomas Jefferson: "...its soul, its climate, its equality, liberty, laws, people, and manners. My God! how little do my countrymen know what precious blessings they are in possession of, and which no other people on earth enjoy!"

Letter to Monroe, June 17, 1785.

Abraham Lincoln: "...I have often inquired of myself what great principle or idea it was that kept this confederacy so long together. It was not the mere matter of the separation of the colonies from the mother land, but that sentiment in the Declaration of Independence which gave liberty, not alone to the people of this country, but, I hope, to the world for all future time. It was that which gave promise that in due time the weight would be lifted from the shoulders of all men."

From a speech at Independence Hall,
Philadelphia, Pa., Feb. 22, 1861
Complete Works, VI, p. 156

Abraham Lincoln: "We find ourselves under the government of a system of political institutions conducing more essentially to the ends of civil and religious liberty than any of which the history of former times tells us. We find ourselves the legal inheritors of these fundamental blessings. ...It is ours, only, to transmit these...to the latest generation that fate shall permit the world to know. This task, gratitude to our fathers, justice to ourselves, duty to posterity and love for our species, in general, all imperatively require us faithfully to perform."

Speech at Springfield, Ill., Jan. 27, 1837.
Complete Works, I, p. 35

Herman Melville: "Settled by the peoples of all nations, all nations may claim her for their own. You cannot spill a drop of American blood without spilling the blood of the whole world.... We are not a narrow tribe of men.... No, our blood is as the flood of the Amazon, made up of a thousand noble currents all pouring into one. We are not a nation, so much as a world."

Redburn, 1849

Theodore Roosevelt: "We here in America hold in our hands the hope of the world, the fate of the coming years. And shame and disgrace will be ours if we trail in the dust the golden hopes of men. We stand against all tyranny by the few or by the many. We stand for the rule of the many in the interest of all of us, for the rule of the many in the spirit of courage, of common sense, of high purpose. Above all, in a spirit of kindly justice towards every man and every woman."

Frederick Lewis Allen: "We would do well to think of our accomplishment this far as but the preface to what we may accomplish... if we can continue to invent, improve, and change--- and can keep a good heart. The courageous nation, like the courageous man, is not unhappy at the prospect of dangers beside the road ahead, but welcomes them as challenges to be faced and overwhelmed along an adventurous course."

FRED NICHOLSON ANNOUNCES FOR CONGRESS

Good Citizens who vote regularly will be rewarded with a reduction of their income taxes, if a proposal made by Judge Fred Nicholson of Warren, Michigan, becomes law.

Nicholson, who for 12 years has served his community as County Prosecutor, State Senator and Justice of the Peace, today announced his candidacy for the U.S. House of Representatives as a Democrat. His "reverse Poll Tax" measure, he said, would work like this:

Whenever a citizen voted in any election, local, state, or national, he would be issued a receipt. The receipts would allow a $2.00 credit each toward the voter's income tax payment.

"This would have a double effect", Nicholson said. "Not only would it reward loyal citizens who never fail to fulfill their obligations at the polls, but by encouraging large numbers of "non-professionals" to vote in the primaries, it would end the stranglehold which the "Kingmakers" today have on the selection of party candidates".

Besides his views on voting, Nicholson expresses his views as follows on moral issues:

"We need a moral re-awakening in Washington", Fred Nicholson, Democratic candidate for the U.S. House of Representatives, said today.

"We must end the practise of using high political office to enhance the private fortunes of individuals and a few favored segments of industry and business.

We need more honesty in the White House and fewer "borrowed" T.V. sets".

Nicholson also expressed his views on the current recession, the draft, education, Canada and the Seaway, and what he called "the plight of the small farmer".

Nicholson proposes the following four measures for ending the recession and restoring the economy to an even keel:

1. Cut the excise taxes on automobiles. This would spur car buying, create jobs for unemployed workers, markets for goods, services and farm products.

2. Begin as soon as possible an accelerated program of needed public works. High on this list should be aid to distressed school districts in the form of building funds and money for current operations.

3. Increase old age benefits to a more realistic figure in view of the current inflation. Lower the retirement age. This will put more money in circulation, and increase the number of jobs available for younger people.

4. Pass legislation to end the point gratuity system that creates artificially high prices for new homes by adding a charge from the lender of mortgage money. Release federal funds for low interest home loans in order to force a lowering of interest rates, which have soard in recent years.

On drafting young men in the armed forces, Nicholson said: "I deplore a system which attempts to teach our young men to be loyal to the Army, Navy, Air Corps or Marines, instead of the United States. Fortunately, our young men are not taken in by the rivalry between the services. "I would work for an early end to the draft. It is unrealistic in view of the changed nature of warfare today. Instead I would advocate a well-trained paid professional army."

"We do our country and our budget no good by dragging unwilling youth to become half-trained soldiers who will forget everything they have learned a short time after concluding a reluctant service."

On the farm problem Nicholson had this to say:

"In 1952 the farmer received 47 cents out of every food dollar. Today he only receives 41 cents, a reduction of 13 percent. Thus, although food prices are higher than ever it is not the fault of the farmer. He actually gets less for his product than he did six years ago.

Our farm policies, carried out under Secretary Ezra Benson, have forced four million persons off the farms since 1953."

Our relations with other countries have reached a new low diplomatically, Nicholson said.

"We not only suffered severe defeats at our own hands in Little Rock and Cape Canaveral," he said, "But our travelling ambassadors, both Dulles and Vice President Nixon, have shed no glory on our country."

"When the Russians launched the first earth satellite," Nicholson said, "we should have kept our heads and congratulated them, as if they were a sort of younger brother who had made a minor achievement. Instead we panicked, and we let the rest of the world know that we had panicked.

We panicked again when Nixon was mobbed in Venezuela, and we made the worst kind of mistake. We sent our Marines to a friendly country, giving our enemies the kind of diplomatic ammunition they so well know how to use.

If we considered the situation dangerous to Nixon we should merely have recalled him."

"Our vacillating attitude on nuclear tests does us no good abroad," Nicholson said. "One day we propose controls, and the next day we turn down an invitation to discuss an end to the tests."

"It would do us no harm," he added, "to accept the Russian proposal for discussions even though we suspect she is insincere. By refusing to participate, we give the impression to other nations that we are the ones who are insincere."

Nicholson, a native of Strathroy, Ontario, Canada, has practised law in Warren for 20 years. He is married, and lives with his wife, Cordelia and daughter Dorothy at 28028 Walker. Dorothy will be attending Ohio Wesleyan College this fall.

Dear Miss Nicholson:

Thank you for your letter of December 3rd. I am happy to give the Reader's Digest permission to print a condensed version of my speech to the Association of Radio and Television News Directors on October 15th of this year. However, it is too late to discuss the matter of exclusive reprint and digest rights, both U. S. and foreign, since the speech has already been reprinted in full by The Reporter magazine and The New Republic, in addition to excerpts having been printed in a large number of publications.

Perhaps you will be good enough to let me know what you wish to do under these circumstances.

Sincerely yours,

Miss Marjorie Nicholson

Dear Mr. Niehoff:

Thank you for your letter of June 11. I do indeed recall meeting you at Fort Slocum.

I did in fact have a brief conversation with Mr. Kopf. He appeared to have some vague plan for a Committee of Correspondence to defend the rights of reporters and it is my personal and confidential opinion that the young man suffers from some kind of persecution complex. I will of course treat your communication as confidential as I hope you will treat this letter.

OFFICE OF BOROUGH MANAGER

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
CBS
New York, N. Y.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Because I had the pleasure of meeting you several times at Fort Slocum where I served as civilian Education Adviser and consultant to Admiral Binford and Colonel Lollie, I feel you will understand and excuse my presumption in addressing this matter to you.

On June 10 I requested our Burgess (mayor) to phone your office to verify a front page item in our Evening Leader stating that you had invited him to supper and to a "secret" meeting in New York. The item is enclosed and is marked " 1. ". Your secretary was kind enough to advise that the meeting and supper was an " ordinary five minute appointment ".

We both feel that we owe you an explanation.

The editor of this local paper was employed by the publisher as a last resort about six months ago, because certain difficulties with the Pennsylvania Newspaper Publishers Association precluded her securing a recognized editor. Unfortunately, the publication at once became a chronicle of sex, murder, suicide, and rape. The news on local events is distorted and relegated to the "dark corners", or even not reported at all. It is general opinion that churches, schools, groups, and individuals are being "run-down" by direction and insinuation, and the community has rebelled by wholesale cancellations of subscriptions. For some unknown reason the woman publisher is helpless, although she is aware of the situation.

We are interested because this small community has been widely recognized as a model, and our example has done much over the years to stimulate community betterment. Now, during a time when our local chamber of commerce is doing a fine job of securing industry, the consistently immoral news on Lehighton appears to be giving us an unearned bad name.

In an attempt to protect himself against the spontaneous reaction against him by his readers, it appears that he resorts to many stories on invitations to him from well-known public figures like yourself, William Allen White, Senator McClellan, and the like. We have traced all of them and find that not one has been even near as reported.

We are, of course, not asking you for anything, except to understand our reason for inquiring, and to ask you to believe that, contrary to anything this man may have discussed with you, our community is not the sordid hell hole he depicts, and that our people believe deeply in freedom of the press, but also in the responsibility of the newspaper to be honest and fair.

We are enclosing a copy of a typical issue of the paper involved so you will appreciate our alarm. We are also enclosing an article on our community written at the request of our State Boroughs Association which has recognized this town as a model.

Please forgive our presumption and our desire to keep this confidential.

Respectfully,

This Is the Place

by WALTER H. NIEHOFF, Borough Manager

THE BOROUGH OF LEHIGHTON

"THIS is the place!"

These simple, but historic words, succinctly express the deep feeling of Brigham Young that, in spite of some obviously forbidding features, the valley of the Great Salt Lake offered exactly those special qualities that should make it the promised land for his persecuted flock.

"This is the place!" reflects the feelings of residents and the reaction of visitors toward the little Borough of Lehighton in northeastern Pennsylvania.

A small residential-industrial community of 6,800, situated on the Lehigh River mid-way between Allentown and Hazleton, it was, until recently, relatively unknown and unrecognized.

Nestled between gentle mountains on a slowly rising slope which levels off into a fertile agricultural valley to the west, Lehighton was a typically comfortable Pennsylvania Dutch community. Like most other small towns it boasted of its clear air and beautiful surrounding scenery. Its two railroads and location on main highways were then among the principal attractions to industry. It had fine schools and thirteen churches. Its people were industrious, thrifty, friendly, and proud. Its many civic and fraternal groups reflected and organized the people's basic desire to respect the old, yet promote, a new Lehighton.

But, of special nature, there was not much to mark this borough. Hundreds of small communities were much the same with little to distinguish one from another. The only possibility for distinction for the borough of Lehighton lay in the persistent and realistic inquiry of the people into the character and potentialities of their hometown.

1943 Is Year of Decision

Then in 1943 these basic strivings of the people suddenly burst into reality through two councilmanic actions of the greatest significance.

March 8, 1943: "Motion by Rabenold, second by Bennett, that the Borough terminate its electric power agreement with the private utility and undertake municipal operation of its electric distribution system. Carried."

April 12, 1943: "Motion by Rabenold, second by Bennett, that a borough manager be employed. Carried."

Thus begins the story of a distinctive Lehighton, of a typical small town overcoming its commonplaceness to win wide recognition for its progressive spirit, its forward-moving administration, and its constantly expanding community services.

We are not writing to sell Lehighton! Nor do we intend to overwhelm the reader with mountains of geographical, physical or financial evidence of our "superiority." We simply want to tell our story, feeling that it contains the elements of general interest, as well as a message of encouragement to our sister boroughs of the Commonwealth.

Electric Power Revenues Important

Essentially, ours is a tale of the rediscovery of a most significant municipal asset, municipal electric power, and how it has been used to promote the well-being of the community, wisely, economically, efficiently, and generously, under the council-manager form of government.

Sparked by a still-growing consciousness among its people that a municipal government with a minimum of political or factional activity or influence, supported by reasonable revenues from its electric utility, can best provide the general civic climate most conducive to community progress, Lehighton has become a place without municipal debt, cash in the bank, low on taxes and high on services.

Its 27 miles of streets and alleys are paved, the more recent ones with utility surplus funds, without tax or assessment of the property owner. Its fourteen-mill tax rate on a 25 per cent assessment base, and no head or per capita tax, provides only about one-fourth of its municipal income, more than one-half derived from utility revenues. There has been no tax increase since the early 1920's.

It has free garbage and ash collection; two well-equipped fire companies, which also serve neighboring boroughs and townships; free ambulance service; two fine parks; a stately municipal building with an open-air amphitheatre; an extensive recreation program under a full-time director, including six play areas and baseball fields covering about 11 acres, a community grove, ice-skating pond, and free swimming.

Its water and sewage systems, conducted under separate authorities, prosper under less than average rates, and its Light and Power department, the fountainhead of prosperity, operates profitably under rates generally lower than those of private utilities.

How It All Started

Lehighton was a pioneer in municipal power. In 1897 a generating plant was erected and equipment installed for power production at a cost of $23,600. The failure of the venture within three short years was typical of the fate of most such municipal ventures at the turn of the century. Without the technical and administrative know-how, and with a bit of politics and favoritism to boot, dissatisfaction led to abandonment.

In 1900, convinced that only private business could run a utility, the borough leased the plant and distribution system to James I. Blakslee, later a U.S. Assistant Postmaster for 25 years. The only compensation to the borough was an annual rental of $1,000 with which to retire the original debt. Later the lease was acquired by the Pennsylvania Power and Light Company.

THE LIGHT AND POWER SUBSTATION, BOROUGH OF LEHIGHTON
The Substation, constructed at a cost of $120,000, was paid for from current revenues as work proceeded.

It now seems natural that a community which had once accepted the idea of municipal ownership should remain influenced by its original dream. The period of private operation was marked by misunderstanding and suspicion. Rates, discounts, regulations, and services were only the main sources of friction.

By 1943 the "steam was bulging the kettle" and, when the private utility rejected a borough request for better rental terms in return for a franchise renewal, the eruption occurred. Not without misgivings, the decision for municipal operation was made.

Lehighton Distributes Power Only

Pending a professional study of the feasibility of resuming municipal generation, a power-purchase arrangement was made with the private utility. The experience proved mutually satisfactory, the cost of purchased power being generally below the cost of municipally generated power, and Lehighton continues to distribute only.

The cost of purchased power, of course, depends upon the power factor and maximum demand, as well as the energy consumed. Our power factor has been consistently good (98), but the demand fluctuates considerably throughout the year. Therefore, in a specific year, the KWH cost ranged from 1.13 cents in April to 1.195 cents in December. For the same year off-peak power averaged 0.71 cents.

The rate schedule now in effect has remained unchanged since it was borrowed from the retiring private utility in 1943. Private rates elsewhere have increased considerably.

A study is now in process to determine the feasibility of further benefit to the local consumer through a one-cent rate for water heating on an off-peak basis. It has been estimated by private consultants that, in addition to giving direct benefit to the user, such a rate would increase our

SURPLUS FUNDS FROM ELECTRIC POWER DEPARTMENT HELP MAINTAIN AND CONSTRUCT GOOD STREETS IN LEHIGHTON
A Borough public works crew lays a stone base for a new street in the Borough of Lehighton. average monthly profits by $870 without added operating expense.

Realizing that to survive and prosper, municipalities must use modern business methods and equipment, our borough recently retained a consulting engineer to survey the technical and financial requirements of the system and has already initiated steps to undertake the recommended improvements.

Having an estimated initial cost in 1943 of $456,000, the system has increased its value by capital improvements to $604,000. These improvements were all achieved with current revenues.

Has Problem of Surplus Funds

After the first few years of operation, revenues produced surplus funds. Most communities face deficits. What should be done with these mounting surpluses? How much should be held in reserve and how much ploughed back for capital improvements? Did the profits belong rightfully to the consumer? Should rates be reduced even lower? Should churches and hospitals receive power free?

Wisely, the borough decided, and the community understood and acquiesced, that since municipal rates had remained unchanged in the face of rising prices in general and private utility rates in particular, the consumer had, in fact, received his share of the fruits of municipal operation.

Surpluses, therefore, should be used to benefit the community in general through improved and added municipal services, which in most communities necessitate increased taxes. Thus, the taxpayer, whose monies had originally paid for the distribution system, would receive a just share of the return on the investment. And the whole community should benefit, for, as Henry George said, the whole community as such gives value to an enterprise.

The effect of this wise decision was the catalytic agent which stimulated the Borough to attain its present enviable position among the leading small communities.

The Light and Power Department is well-equipped and efficient. It owes no debts, and has a $150,000 reserve for capital improvements or emergency use. All capital additions, including a $120,000 substation, modern line equipment, and rolling stock were paid for in cash from current revenues.

The program for annual extension of mercury-vapor street lighting in Lehighton entails an expenditure of approximately $10,000 for materials alone. This project will be accelerated this year to reduce the period of completion.

Department surpluses are periodically transferred for general borough use. Borough tax receipts do not exceed $53,000 annually, and together with miscellaneous receipts, surely could not support the services desired. Approximately one-half of the annual budget, ranging between $200,000 to $250,000, is supported by power fund surpluses.

The Power Department pays to the borough an annual system rental of $48,000 (in lieu of taxes) and pays a $15,000 annual grant to meet the sewer lease rental required of the borough. In addition, in the last two years, over $100,000 of the department surpluses was used to pave old and build new streets and alleys. Nearly $40,000 of the same funds erected a 150′ x 50′ concrete block garage and maintenance building for general borough use. The radio transmission equipment, including 12 mobile units, was financed largely with such funds. And borough recreation expenditures ranging close to $13,000 each year would be impossible without them.

This, briefly, is the Lehighton story. A community strives for identity, recognizes a great asset, and uses it wisely for the general good.

But this success story might have evolved differently. Had our community forgotten the causes of the failure of the initial venture in public power, that tragic story would have been repeated. Operation by a lay borough council, or a committee, or by a separate, politically appointed commission, as suggested, undoubtedly would have doomed the venture.

At the hour of decision, a twelve-year school-community educational campaign on behalf of council-manager government bore fruit. It was at once obvious to the council and the community that only a professional full-time manager, under a utility-conscious, non-political council, could provide the legislative and administrative direction required by the electric utility and the borough alike.

Council-Manager Plan Adopted

Lehighton became a council-manager borough little more than a month after the utility decision. And there began a second, though somewhat less spectacular, chapter in the Lehighton Story, which should prove of interest and value to other boroughs which have retained the conventional form of borough government.

Early History

Founded by the Moravians of Bethlehem in 1746 as a mission for Indian refugees from New York and Connecticut, the original settlement of Lehighton was called Gnaden Huetten, meaning Mercy Huts. Following Braddock's defeat in 1755 the little mission was destroyed in a now famous "Massacre of November 24." Not until after Colonel Benjamin Franklin was commissioned to build Fort Allen, across the river (now Weissport), in 1756, did settlers venture into the area.

Growth was slow until 1855 when the Lehigh Valley Railroad was completed. At that time the village had only 300 residents. Its location on this railway attracted small industries, and by Civil War years its industrial-residential character had become established.

Lehighton was incorporated as a borough on January 2, 1866 with John Lentz, a railroad man, as its first burgess and council president.

Beginning with a council of five, whose first official action was to appoint a policeman and establish fees for rounding up stray hogs and geese, the council today consists of nine members, three from each of the borough's wards. Floyd Miner is president, succeeding Eugene McCarty in January, 1958.

BAER POOLS SKATING POND

During the winter months skating at Baer Pools Skating Pond is a popular recreational activity of many of the citizens of Lehighton. Many other recreational facilities are available to the citizens of the borough.

Present Status of Borough

The council is divided into nine standing committees which functioned as administrative bodies prior to the adoption of a council-manager government, but which now act primarily as investigative bodies to aid in councilmanic policy-making. Councilmen receive a monthly stipend of ten dollars.

The administration consists of a manager and four major departments, each with a qualified superintendent or chief: Public Works, John Horn, superintendent; Light and Power, Lawrence Kimmel, superintendent; Fire, Corvin Solt, chief; and Police, Lee Walsh, chief. All departments and agencies are responsible to the manager, with the exception of the police department which is under the burgess, James M. Beisel, Jr.

There are 27 regular employees, which require an annual payroll of $110,000. Employees receive from one to three weeks vacation, 30 days sick-leave, 6 paid holidays, and time and one-half pay for overtime.

The 1957 real estate and occupational assessment in Lehighton was $3,900,000 and the tax rate was 14 mills. There is no per-capita levy for borough purposes. Under the newly instituted county reassessment program, the 1958 assessment will be $6,600,000 and the tax rate approximately 8 mills.

In 1957, borough expenditures were $217,000, while Light and Power disbursements amounted to $298,000, of which more than $100,000 was used for general borough purposes.

The 1958 budgets provide for approximately the same amounts as in the previous year. Major borough capital expenditures will be for storm and sanitary sewer installations, and for street resurfacing and construction. The Light and Power Department is starting a program of sectionalizing its primary distribution lines at an estimated cost of $50,000, and extending mercury vapor lighting to all streets and alleys.

The first point of our story was that power distribution made possible the material progress of the borough. The point of the second chapter, which began with adoption of the council-manager plan, is that our great municipal progress could not have been realized, even with electric funds, had the old type of municipal government been retained.

The administration of Lehighton's extensive services, including electric, sewerage, and water utilities, requires expert full-time administration, and the application of the most modern business and engineering techniques. Lay committees, no matter how well-intentioned, serving part-time would be inadequate.

Manager's Functions

The office of manager in Lehighton is almost purely administrative, the technical responsibilities of the utilities and other services being left to qualified superintendents. Since 1953 the original requirement that the manager be a registered engineer has been replaced by the qualification that he must have administrative training and competence.

The need for emphasis on administration became obvious with the increase and expansion of municipal services, especially with the formation of sewerage and water authorities. In many communities these authorities are under separate management. By agreement between these legally separate agencies, the manager of the borough is manager of all.

Thus the manager is secretary to the council, borough manager, manager of the light and power department, sewerage and water authorities, and zoning administrative officer, as well as administrator or advisor of other minor agencies. While this "one for all" plan poses an imposing task for the manager, it has made possible an administrative integration of legally separate municipal services and agencies not usually attained in most communities.

A current illustration of the cooperation attained by such a development in administrative integration is the joint plans for construction during the year 1958. The borough will open and grade several new streets and install storm sewers. The sewerage authority has pledged funds to install sewer mains and laterals, while the water authority is now planning for water main extensions. All plans will be coordinated and carried out under direction of the same manager.

Prior to 1953, Lehighton had become generally known for its extensive municipal services financed mainly from power funds. Since 1953 it has been noted for its progressiveness in municipal administration. The first steps in this direction were made by D. Richard Wenner, manager from 1953 to 1955.

The present manager recently submitted to his retiring council a souvenir report called "Two Years, 1956-1957," which illustrates many of the administrative improvements not usually found in small non-manager boroughs, and certainly not accomplished in so short a period. The report includes a listing of fifty major achievements accomplished during the two-year term of a council, and reflects the administrative progressiveness of the borough's officials.

Cooperation Increases Efficiency

To indicate to non-manager boroughs what can be done to improve municipal government in a relatively short time by a cooperative council, acting as the policy-maker, and a full-time manager directing administration, a portion of the list of accomplishments follows:

1. Streamlined the functioning of borough council through a printed agenda, including factual information, which is released for individual study several days prior to meetings. Printed official reports replaced time-consuming oral reports, and agenda items are published prior to meetings for public use.
2. Modernized procedures for electric, water, and sewerage offices, including triple billing.
3. Instituted accrual accounting and employed a certified public accountant.
4. Systematized the preservation and use of plans and maps through a modern Plan File.
5. Codified borough ordinances through the Penns Valley Publishers, Inc.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

WALTER H. NIEHOFF, a native of Lehighton, has been borough manager since August, 1955. He graduated from Lehighton High School in 1928 and from Lafayette College in 1932. From the latter date until 1946 he served as chairman and teacher of social studies in the Lehighton public schools, except for the year 1935-1936, when he was a graduate assistant in Political Science at The Pennsylvania State University, from which institution he received his Masters Degree.

W. H. Niehoff

From 1946 until 1951 Mr. Niehoff served as assistant professor of Political Science at Dickinson College, specializing in Public Administration and State and Municipal Government. From 1951 until 1955 he served as an Educational and Administrative Consultant and Advisor at the Armed Forces Information School at Fort Slocum, New York. With the exception of the dissertation, he has completed all the required work and the preliminary examinations for the degree of Doctor of Philosophy at Penn State.

Through school projects during 13 years in Lehighton, Mr. Niehoff has helped to bring about most of the progressive programs in his community which he now administers as borough manager.

6. Replaced annual fire service agreements with adjacent borough and townships with continuing contracts.
7. Integrated the insurance of the borough, light and power department, water authority, sewerage authority, and the recreation commission into a single master program.
8. Promoted public relations by improving municipal services through installation of two-way radio equipment.
9. Surveyed sewage plant deficiencies, and in cooperation between the borough and the sewerage authority, projected and completed a program of major improvements to increase plant capacity.
10. Inaugurated a policy of installing water and sewerage laterals on all newly opened streets, eliminating the previous practice of digging up streets after construction when laterals were individually requested.
11. Surveyed types and condition of all equipment and formulated a systematic program of preventative maintenance and replacement.
12. Improved refuse collection, thereby saving $1,400 in overtime wages alone during the first six months.
13. Initiated a program of annual mercury vapor street light installation to replace inefficient and uneconomical incandescents.
14. Conducted a technical survey and analysis of the electric distribution system with the object of planning improvements and establishing adequate legal reserves.
15. Adopted an orderly and technically desirable policy on street opening and construction.
16. Resurfaced nearly 80 per cent of borough streets as a first step in an annual plan of reconstruction and improvement.
17. Promoted public relations, and saved funds, by replacing the cinder method of snow and ice control with the salt-Banox treatment, an innovation which has received extensive national recognition as well as emulation by sister boroughs and cities.
18. Formulated a comprehensive cooperative recreational policy between the borough and school district.
19. Instituted a modern inventory system for all agencies of the borough.
20. Initiated in-service training for employees to promote efficiency and permit interchange of personnel in emergencies.

The sequel to our Lehighton story remains to be written. We have no serious desires of becoming a metropolis. We want to be a good community, not a big one. With the financial resources of our electric utility to lend support, and the administrative measures already taken, there exists, we believe, a solid basis for steady constructive advance in the number and quality of municipal services. Assuming a continuation of our almost traditional "no politics in borough affairs" the Borough of Lehighton stands on the threshold of its most progressive era.

Our hope is that the significance of our Lehighton Story will guide our sister boroughs to new paths of progress.

To the Officials of the Boroughs in Pennsylvania

At this moment I am giving thought to the meaning of the term "Politician." All of us are politicians of a sort. To some people, the term Politician carries a meaning that is not too complimentary. To me, a Politician is a man experienced in using human nature for the government of the people.

Gus D. Houtman

I present here the ideas of Hon. Robert B. Meyner, governor of New Jersey, as he expressed them before the National Press Club in Washington recently:

> An effective politician anticipates an issue before it becomes critical and divisive . . . He has his own radar system for spotting needs before they blow up to critical proportions. And he knows enough to move swiftly to meet a problem in its early stage. Despite his partisanship and his personal involvement, he is more effective than the individual who sits on the sidelines taking the lofty view that he is above politics and that politics is a dirty business.

The Governor's ideas agree rather well with mine.

Yours very truly,

Gus

CARL W. WILD RECEIVES APPOINTMENT

Carl W. Wild has been appointed a deputy secretary of the Pennsylvania State Department of Highways, to head the newly-created division of planning and research. Lewis M. Stevens, Secretary of Highways, made the appointment recently.

From 1945 to 1957 Mr. Wild was in private practice as a consultant on city and regional planning and landscape architecture. He served as planning consultant for the State College Planning Commission, and for the Institute of Local Government, The Pennsylvania State University. Recently he became vice president of Community Planning Services, Inc., at Monroeville. Mr. Wild will be working closely with Henry D. Harral who was recently appointed as the first chief deputy secretary of the Department of Highways. Mr. Harral is on leave of absence from the Fels Institute of Local and State Government, University of Pennsylvania, where he has served as supervisor of the Municipal Assistance Service for the past several years.

Dear Mr. Nimick:

I do apologize for the long delay in replying to your recent letter about SMALL WORLD. Unfortunately, my correspondence has suffered at the hands of the unusually large number of documentaries in which I have been involved recently.

Thank you for your offer of help. We shall certainly bear it in mind and call upon you if we need your advice.

Mr. Edward R. Murrow,

Dear Mr. Murrow:

I would like to express our enthusiasm for your recognition of the need for more discussion of our relations with Latin America as exemplified by Sunday's "Small World" telecast. I sincerely hope that it was enthusiastically received by the public at large and that there will be more of the same.

Because of the note on which the program ended - that by mutual cooperation we in this hemisphere can combat communism - I thought you might be interested in the enclosed booklet which we recently prepared for distribution at the annual meeting of the U. S. Inter-American Council.

While we, too, reach the same conclusion as your panel, I think you'll agree that the present degree of communist penetration documented in this report should be a matter of public knowledge so that we are better prepared to meet its threat.

We agree with you, also, that one of the basic handicaps in our relations with Latin America is the limited dissemination in the U. S. of any news of these countries except for revolutions and disaster. We are trying on a businessman level to combat this lack of knowledge with continuing reports on the area (our Highlights in Latin America, trade reports and special reports like the enclosed). If at any time we can be of help to you, or any member of your staff, I hope that you will let us know.

Sincerely,

Alexander Nimick

COMMENTS ON THE PROBLEMS OF THE NEW YORK CIVIL COURTS

For many, many years people who have used our civil courts have been greatly disappointed at the service they have received. They have found it and still find it too slow, too expensive, too complicated. They have wondered and still do why it was so hard for them to get justice, which they had always supposed was one of our greatest privileges and blessings.

Doubtless, many of them wondered, also, why it has been, and still is, so difficult to improve the service of these courts.

The present situation is not due to the fact that we do not know what should be done. We do. It does not make sense to assume that well over 100 years has not been sufficient time to reconcile and adjust differences and to agree to the necessary basic changes.

But that seems not to have occurred.

Almost the last writing which Chief Justice Vanderbilt did before his untimely death was a little book, published in 1955, which he called "The Challenge of Law Reform". In it (p. 145), he said that the "task we are now contemplating is of far greater magnitude than any undertaken in the past by the legal profession in any common-law country." Then he puts this pertinent question: "To whom shall we turn for help?"

It is natural to think that any necessary improvement can and will be made by the legislature or by the judges or by the bar. But it has been demonstrated again and again, in New York, that we cannot look to any of these sources for real relief.

The all-important question today is not how to change court organization or remedy defects in the Code or in procedure, essential as these things are, but how to deal with the conditions responsible for the lack of progress for so many years. The reasons for this are not obscure, although they are not much talked about.

The legislature has demonstrated again and again that it is not interested in improving the work of the civil courts. There are many illustrations of this.

In 1890, for instance, the legislature created a legislative commission on the courts. It worked for 9 years. It filed a report of 6865 pages with recommendations. Nothing was done.

Fifty-six years ago (1902), there were complaints about court delay and the legislature created the "Commission on Law's Delays". It was made up of well-known lawyers. Its report demanded immediate and effective relief. It characterized the delay problem in the Supreme Court of New York as "of the gravest character" and made recommendations (Rep. p. 47). The legislature did nothing.

In 1902, also, the legislature created a committee known as the "Committee of Fifteen". It made similar suggestions. Nothing was done.

In 1907 the legislature created another commission. It worked eight years. Its report contained 2634 pages. Nothing was done.

In 1915 it created still another committee which worked for four years. It circulated suggestions among 10,000 lawyers in the state and recommended that the code of that day be broken up in various separate statutes. This was done.

In the early thirties many business men in the state decided to work for court reform through the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York. On November 5, 1931, a Sub-Committee on Law Reform of the Executive Committee of the Chamber filed a report which states:

> "We find that today there is no general supervision or regulation of the courts. No private business of this magnitude could survive under modern conditions without centralized direction.
> "In our 1930 report, we condemned 'the standards of the legal profession which tolerate dilatory and technical practices tending to conceal the merits of the case and use of legal procedure for the purpose of embarrassing opponents, forcing settlements, and delaying or denying justice.' "

Seventeen commercial organizations and eleven bar associations cooperated in this effort.

The Chamber presented its recommendations to the legislature but nothing was done.

In 1931, the legislature created the "Commission on the Administration of Justice in New York State". It was an outstanding body. One of its enthusiastic members was Robert H. Jackson, later Justice of the United States Supreme Court. It filed a report of 1016 pages, with many recommendations. (Leg. Doc. 1934, No. 50.) The legislature ignored all but three of them.

In 1933, a Committee of the Association of the Bar of the City of New York, under the Chairmanship of Edward J. Dimock, now a Judge of the United States District Court, prepared a shortened form of the Code of Civil Procedure to meet, in part, complaints about the unnecessary complexity of court procedure. Great labor was involved; so much so that the Committee found it necessary to obtain a grant of $10,000 from a foundation for its work. Its report filled 828 pages. No one in the legislature would even introduce a bill embodying the Committee's recommendations.

In 1935, the Citizens Budget Committee of New York City published a voluminous report recommending economies and organizational changes in the court. The legislature took no action.

In the last five years the legislature has spent well over $900,000 of taxpayers' money on projects for court reform. But the public has received practically no benefit.

Over the years it has regulated minute details of court methods but it has not been concerned with the basic problems involved.

In the very recent past it has refused to cooperate with Former Justice David W. Peck, and others, in efforts to consolidate the numerous courts of New York City.

In the last 100 years, the legislature has created commissions on the courts at the rate of about one every four years. Their reports, filed away in library stackrooms and forgotten, fill almost 40,000 pages. In this very year we have seen the failure of the most recent of them.

The legislature has been almost uncanny in its methods. Again and again, when protests have been heard, it has lulled objectors into inaction by creating a commission, made up of most estimable people, in whom the public has confidence, to study the complaints. It knows the public is gullible enough to believe that such a commission can solve the problem, which, of course, it cannot.

Most of these commissions have worked conscientiously and skillfully , but by the time their reports and recommendations have been sent to the legislature, the public has forgotten all about them, and things have gone on as before.

This strategy has been completely successful.

Great is politics in the administration of justice!

The courts cannot be relied on to improve themselves. From its beginning in 1691 up to 1848, when the Field Code appeared, (157 years) the Supreme Court (the state-wide general court) made its own rules. It still has that power, but it uses it very little. For years it has submitted almost abjectly to the control of the legislature and the legislature has used that control for political purposes not to improve the courts. The Constitutional Convention Committee of 1938, in its report (p. 734) stated:

> "However, despite some dissatisfaction with judicial procedure, the judges here are unable or unwilling to exercise to any degree their inherent power ***."

Speaking of the attitude of judges to the recommendations of the recent Temporary Commission on the Courts, its Chairman, Harrison Tweed, reported:

> "Aligned in opposition, and in the forefront of it, were most of the Supreme Court Justices and the surrogates, and many of the county judges . The opposition of these judges was irrespective of party affiliation or geographical location. ***
> "They wish no change in the present state of affairs and, particularly, they wish no supervision of themselves or their personnel in the conduct of their court business.  It is a truism that the relationship between judges and politicians is very close and that their combined influence in the Legislature is very great." (New York Times, April 4, 1958.)

However, the courts have been responsible for some progress in recent years.

Delay has been reduced in some counties by the courts themselves by the use of their "inherent powers". These are powers which the courts possess just because they are courts and function as such. With the exercise of these powers neither the legislature nor the political organizations can interfere, except by penalizing the judges who exercise them.

In some counties, using these same powers, the judges have eliminated "deadwood" from the dockets by examining cases while they are pending and disposing of many of them in that way. In some instances they have adopted rules compelling litigants to certify that their cases are ready for trial before they can be put on a calendar for trial and by arranging for the use of impartial medical experts in personal injury cases, Delay has been reduced. by these methods

It is unlikely that the legislature would refuse to approve improvements or changes backed by a majority of the approximately 130 judges of the Supreme Court. But that situation seems seldom, if ever, to have arisen.

Past experience in this field holds out little promise that the situation will be remedied by the courts themselves.

The Bar of the state has made few real contributions to court improvement. In 1958, there were about 35,000 lawyers in the state, 27,000 of whom were in New York City.

Referring to their attitude toward the recent commission, Mr. Tweed has this to say:

> "Among the professional groups some, but by no means all, of the Bar Associations gave their support. Finally, among the lawyers, a few - but a very few - raised their voices. " (New York Times, April 4, 1958.)

This is typical, except for the few devoted lawyers and judges, sensitive to the shortcomings of the courts, who always are working for improvement, and usually in vain.

There is no all-inclusive organization of lawyers; but there are many voluntary bar associations--those in the rural areas with few members often with little activity and those in the cities, some with several thousand members and considerable activity. There is also a state-wide bar association with some 10,000 members.

These organizations create committees that study various aspects of court work as well as recommendations for improvement. But the meetings of these associations at which such recommendations and reports are considered and acted on are ordinarily so sparesely attended that the approval or disapproval of the reports, in these meetings, has no real significance or influence, either with the legislature or the public, They do not represent the opinion of the bar as a whole. Indeed it never acts as a whole.

But these and other efforts of the bar have produced almost no changes in the basic defects of the system of which the public has complained so long.

The Association of the Bar of the City of New York has taken more interest in law reform than most of the others. It had its beginnings in an attempt to curb judicial corruption (1872). It has cooperated with various commissions studying the courts and with three Constitutional Conventions. In 1902 it fostered the organization of the "Commission on Law's Delays" and cooperated actively with it. It has issued special reports dealing with law reform. The report of Judge Dimock's Committee 1933 (supra) is an illustration of this. In 1952 it worked for a non-political plan for the selection of judges. It has shown almost continuous activity, largely through committees.

But it is difficult to locate much real benefit to the public from these efforts.

In New Jersey not one of the bar associations in the state supported the movement of 1947 for better courts. By contrast the popular vote was three and a half to one in favor of it.

* * * * * * * * * *

Since the only function of the courts is to serve the public and since they are created and are paid for by the public (the New York courts cost about $68,000,000 a year) it would seem that the taxpayers would insist on improvements when necessary.

But that is far from the fact.

The vast majority of people have little or no contact with the civil courts and have little interest in them. As an abstract proposition everyone believes in justice; but few have care enough to do anything about improving the courts.

In New York there has been little demand by the public for court improvement since 1848, when many people supported David Dudley Field's unfortunate efforts for codification, on the theory that once the rules of procedure were written down, all difficulties would disappear.

How wrong he was!

Another factor is the ignorance of the public regarding the courts. How many of us know how the New York Supreme Court differs from the Court of Appeals? How many of us can state just how a Judicial Conference differs from a Judicial Council? How many can explain "rule-making power" or the "inherent powers" of the courts? How many can state how the functions of the legislature and the courts differ in this field?

Almost never has there been enough public interest in the courts to make court improvement an issue in any political campaign. Political party leaders have been, and are now, quite satisfied with things as they are. This public ignorance and lassitude about the courts mean money, power, jobs and influence for them. Why change?

An important requisite for creating public interest in the courts is active press support. The English newspapers and magazines were primarily responsible for the great reforms of 1873. For a hundred years the London Times gave its readers from six to eleven columns of daily reports on the law courts.

Until recently, press support has been lacking in New York. Of late, however, newspapers have shown some increase of interest in court conditions. This is particularly true of the New York Times. Various other important papers of the state have helped, as have various lay organizations like the League of Women Voters and the New York Chamber of Commerce.

* * * * * * * * *

From what has happened over these many years, it seems fair therefore to say that, in New York, neither the legislature, nor the courts, nor the bar, can be relied on to initiate or to provide needed changes. There appears to be no escape from the conclusion that those who have the power to remedy the situation do not want to remedy it, and will prevent improvement if they can, as they have done so often in the past.

It may well be, therefore, that the real court problem, today, is not to assemble more statistics or to reduce the number of courts or to create new ones or prepare a new code, but, first of all, to find some way to induce those that have the power to act, to do something.

This is the belief of former Judge Joseph M. Proskauer, who has had a wide experience in government and as a trial lawyer and appellate judge. He made a definite contribution to this problem in his autobiography "A Segment of My Times" when he said (p. 149):

> "Now to what does all this lead? Scholars have written and bar associations have passed resolutions on law reform. We have had research and investigation until the truth is as clear as the noonday sun.

"I emphasize, however, that the letter killeth and that the spirit giveth life. We need a will to reform.

"If we have that will, reform will come largely without any change in statute or rule."

If Judge Proskauer is right, there is but one immediate problem today, i.e., how to deal with those in the political organizations, in the Bar, on the Bench, in the Legislature, who block progress, some for selfish reasons, some for political reasons, some because they wish nothing changed, many because they just don't care, some because they do not want equal justice for all, but the variety of justice that is to their particular liking.

Some years ago New Jersey had a court problem similar to that in New York today, and solved it.

On May 5, 1957, the New York Times published a statement by Chief Justice Vanderbilt explaining how that was done. In that statement he said:

"The New York Legislature adjourned recently without taking favorable action on the bills for court reform on which the Temporary (Tweed) Commission on the New York Courts had labored for four years. The proposals of the commission, well intended though they were, were so watered down in a vain attempt not to lose any possible source of support for its program that the result was a mere shadow of genuine court reform. This is characteristic of every movement for judicial reform in its initial phase.

"We, too, sought to retain the support of the leaders of the bench and the bar. We likewise consented to the watering down process in an effort to appease the advocates of the status quo, only to have our proposals passed one year in one house of the Legislature and then defeated in the other house (and vice versa the next year).

"Accordingly, after fourteen years of struggle, we then decided to do what had been done in England almost a century before - to carry the battle to the people and ignore the judges, the lawyers and the politicians. People from every walk of life were organized in committees. Their influence was so great that the Legislature could not ignore them; under the leadership of Gov. Alfred E. Driscoll, it provided for a Constitutional Convention and a new Constitution was adopted in November, 1947 - seventeen years after the beginning of our struggle - by a popular vote of three and a half to one.

"As a result of our experience, I hazard a guess that real judicial reform will not come in any large jurisdiction by any other method than direct appeal to the people. What happened in England and, much more recently, in New Jersey, proves it. The stage is now set for in New York for such a campaign. I can well understand the discouragement today of the members of the Temporary Commission, but I venture to repeat what I said after the years of battling in New Jersey: 'Manifestly judicial reform is no sport for the short-winded or for lawyers who are afraid of temporary defeat.' "

The most important sentences in this statement are these: "People from every walk of life were organized in committees. Their influence was so great that the Legislature could not ignore them; and "a new Constitution was adopted by a popular vote of three and a half to one."

This was done on the very sound theory that, in this field, votes are more powerful than anything else. Legislatures may disregard reports of commissions. They do not disregard election returns.

In recent months various plans have been made to step up efforts to meet the situation here.

The Governor has asked the Judicial Conference (which is made up of the Chief Justice of the State, the Presiding Justices of the four Appellate Divisions, and four Supreme Court Justices) to suggest a program.

The League of Women Voters of New York has made the same request of the Institute of Judicial Administration which is a part of New York University, the function of which is to make available information regarding the administration of justice.

Mayor Wagner has recently appointed an able committee to examine the court problem. It will probably make recommendations to the next legislature.

In 1955, "The Committee for Modern Courts" was organized to create public support for court reform measures. It has an office in New York City and doubtless will continue its activity.

Some two years ago, several generous, public-spirited citizens financed and launched a research project, centered in the law school at Columbia University, to develop useful information regarding the work of the courts and to make recommendations for action. This group should make helpful suggestions.

A shortened and simplified Code of Civil Procedure is being prepared at Columbia University by a group originally created by the Temporary Commission on the Courts. It should be completed in 1960. In September 1958, it issued a partial draft of such a code (597 pps).

A shortened and simplified Code was recommended by commissions of the legislature or by others in 1900, 1907, 1921 and 1933, but in most instances nothing was done.

Judging the future by the past, there is doubt if the legislature will enact a new code now. And even if it does, it is difficult to see how a new code can create a "will to reform".

To the public, the present situation is one of confusion. Many people realize something should be done; but no one is known as a leader in efforts for change, and there is no way for voters to register their views, opinions or demands.

Even if all the changes proposes were made, our problem might not be solved. The judges and lawyers under a new regime are not likely to be much different, in their ideas and ideals, from those of today. If they like delay and other conditions which mar the work of the present courts, there will be little change after the reform process is over. Courts are very human affairs. They are as frail as human nature is frail. Streamlining and a new code are not enough. There must be a "will to reform".

Someday perhaps some political leader will explain to the public why we have waited so many years for a non-political method of selecting judges; why we cannot have a system for assigning judges (they cost us about $160,000, each, per year), who are not fully occupied where they are, to localities where the courts are behind and the public is waiting for justice; and why our courts cannot be simplified and given business-like administration.

Let us be under no illusion about this situation. The judges of our state courts and their personnel, for the most part, are selected by political bosses, both in the city and upstate, and must remain in good standing, politically, if they are to be re-elected or reappointed.

In an editorial on September 8, 1958, the New York Times called this situation a "farce" saying:

> "Once more the farce of 'electing' State Supreme Court judges has begun-a parody on democracy and good government. Last Tuesday Democratic and Republican political leaders met --informally and entirely 'off the record.' They chose seven judges to sit in Queens, Nassau and Suffolk Counties. The voters didn't, and won't have anything to do with it."

What a strange thing is this problem of justice! Justice is supposed to be a priceless heritage for us all and for our children. Yet, generation after generation we, in New York, have seen constant political bickering, lack of agreement as to what should be done, constant failure to face the practical and political aspects of the problem and constant efforts by a few devoted lawyers and judges for improvement,most of which have been of little effect.

There are good reasons for this situation. Any candid examination of what has happened will show continued public apathy and the skillful advantage which the politicians take of it. Such an examination will show also that success can come only through adequate and continued pressure for improvement by the public. This is the only answer to Judge Vanderbilt's question (supra) "To whom shall we turn for help?"

But the public never has and is not likely now to act to this end of its own accord. The average citizen doubtless believes in efficient, economical and speedy justice but he has little time or incentive to study the problems of the courts sufficiently to have any definite opinion about them. That is too much to expect of him. So he does nothing. Indeed he feels there is nothing that in reason he can do.

It seems clear therefore that it success is to come methods must be devised to furnish the public with more facts about the courts than it has had in the past and with better ways for expressing its opinions and its convictions. Once this is done it may be reasonable to expect voters to take an effective interest in the courts.

As one looks back over the past 100 years the situation seems pretty hopeless; but there may be a partial answer in better methods to this end.

In 1903 an organization was created in California to do just this---The Commonwealth Club of California. Its Founder Edward F. Adams, stated:

"The good elements which compose the vast majority of our population lack only good leadership to unite them for good purposes. I propose that we lead. I have no fear of lack of following so long as it is self-evident that we only propose to find truth and turn it loose in the world."

Today the Club has 8500 members. Its dues are $21.00 a year for residents. It has a backlog of about $350,000, the income of which is used to finance the work of its 27 "study groups", each of which devotes itself to some phase of the affairs of the state. All members are free to join any of these groups. One is devoted to the administration of justice; and the Club has had a very effective part in improving the courts.

Its views are highly respected in the legislature, undoubtedly because it represents votes---its own and many others.

Its holds weekly luncheons which have been described as the West's foremost sounding board. On this rostrum five presidents of the United States have spoken as have representatives of almost every shade of opinion on omportant public questions.

These luncheon talks have been broadcast since 1924; for the past 9 years by the Oakland Tribune over Station KLX. They are very largely attended.

The experience of this organization may have some suggestiveness for us.

Such a group is something we have never had. It could be state-wide, made up mostly of laymen backed by the press of the state, kept out of politics, well-heeled financially and ably led, well posted on the operation and work of the courts and on the improvements they require. Such a group might be a rallying point for those who are dissatisfied with the courts and might furnish leadership for them which has been sadly lacking for years.

Perhaps some day the voters will be given a chance to express themselves on the court problem; and if and when they do, the status quo devotees may be in for a surprise.

Until some such group goes to work, and works, not spasmodically, but keeps at it, and never underestimates the power, skill, financial resources, and anti-public motives and staying power of its opponents in politics and out, we can be quite sure of little, if any, better service from the civil courts than we have been getting for years and are getting now.

A beginning along these lines may have been made in 1955, when the "Committee for Modern Courts" (supra) was organized.

In 1957, and again this year, the Attorney General's Office in Washington assembled a conference on "Court Congestion and Delay in Litigation". Each was made up of more than 100 representatives of bar associations and others interested in the courts, from all over the country.

One of the recommendations of the first conference was that "all possible means be utilized to focus public attention on both the accomplishments and shortcomings of our judicial systems. * * * This is currently lacking."

This paper has been prepared in the hope that it may contribute to that end.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Apropos of our talk the other day about a telecast regarding the work of the law, by chance I ran across the following in the Cleveland Bar Association Journal for May 1954 at p. 110:

" 'JUSTICE' SHOW MAKES TELEVISION DEBUT"

"A new television dramatic show portraying true life cases handled by legal aid organizations made its premiere telecast over the NBC network Thursday evening, April 8, 1954.

" 'Justice! ' is the title of the weekly series of programs to be sponsored by the Borden Company and televised from New York. Thirty major stations from coast to coast will carry the program 'live' each Thursday night, while another 17 stations will televise the show from film at later times.

"The new program is of particular interest to lawyers in that it will depict the services that the legal profession performs in making counsel available to the poor as well as the wealthy. The National Legal Aid Association is cooperating with the producers in supplying story material, and in technical consultations."

I hope I may have some suggestions for you in the near future but it occurred to me you might be interested to see the above now.

With kindest regards.

Sincerely yours,

Harry D. Nims

ADDRESS BY HON. BERNARD BOTEIN, PRESIDING JUSTICE, APPELLATE DIVISION, SUPREME COURT,
FIRST DEPARTMENT

Law Day U.S.A. Ceremony
County Courthouse, Foley Square
10:00 a.m., May 1, 1958

We are gathered here to refresh our appreciation of the system of laws under which our society has been organized and under which our country has flourished. We who are absorbed the year around with the law may well embrace this occasion to share our enthusiasms and concerns with the public generally; to reaffirm our faith in government under law; and to restore the faith of the faltering and pierce the complacency of the overconfident.

For ours is not a perfect system of law. Its genius lies in the fact that it has been shaped to serve an expanding society, and adapt itself to new needs as they arise, without sacrifice of essential integrity. The law has kept pace with the society that it has helped to build, but it has enjoyed a disciplined and well-organized growth. Liberty is at its sturdiest when it finds its roots in well-cultivated law.

We must demonstrate to a watchful world that our citizens live under a body of law that protects their rights while fixing their obligations to the community; and that they are not subject to the unpredictable whim and tyranny of dictatorship. By example and conduct we must discourage the terrible contagion of lawlessness on the individual or international level. We must be able to show an unwavering respect for law, on the local as well as the national scene, because Little Rock, Arkansas looms as large as all of the United States in many areas of world opinion.

Respect for the law will not be easily maintained by those who feel, rightly or wrongly, that they have been outraged by the law. If a sense of injustice is engendered, it rankles just as deeply in the court of a justice of the peace as in the Supreme Court of the United States--and there are several thousand times as many justices of the peace. Perhaps we should reexamine our notions as to the relative importance of our courts. Locally in this city, the so-called higher courts of criminal jurisdiction handling felony charges dispose of less than 8,000 cases annually. Compare this with the record of the so-called inferior courts of criminal jurisdiction. There are two and a half million arraignments in the Magistrate's Courts of this city each year. The Court of Special Sessions disposes of 42,000 of the more serious misdemeanor cases; and remember, many a misdemeanor conviction can destroy a life as effectively as a felony conviction.

Most challenging among our inferior courts is the Domestic Relations Court. Annually, the destinies of tens of thousands of families are shaped in this court; or sometimes permitted to drift to disaster because of the inadequate number of judicial and social service personnel. If there is any chance judicially to control juvenile and adult delinquency, it resides primarily in these lower courts.

In the Supreme Court of this city something like 26,000 civil cases are disposed of annually. Compare this figure with the disposition of over a quarter million cases in the Municipal and Small Claims Courts. One wonders, therefore, where the average citizen's idea of justice is molded--in the higher or the inferior courts?

Perhaps in our anxiety to furnish the parties with an early trial we have overlooked the quality of the justice we offer at destination point. For the parties must leave the courthouse feeling that, win or lose, they have had a thorough, expert, impartial and considerate treatment at the hands of all connected with the administration of the law. Locally the situation is mitigated by the intelligent, consistent contribution of the Legal Aid Society, which yearly provides tens of thousands of the needy and unfortunate with a friend in court.

Respect for the law cannot trickle down from the higher courts. It must be within sight and within grasp of all. The man in the street has little or no direct contact with our appellate courts. His opinion of our entire legal system will reflect his experience in the lower courts on which the whole judicial pyramid is based. I suggest, therefore, that we direct more of our attention to these lower courts, and to the problems of the inarticulate millions who swarm in and out of them. The architects of our present-day law structure can well ponder the words of Marcus Aurelius: "What is not good for the swarm is not good for the bee."

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Your reply to my letter of May 17th was greatly appreciated. I hope that your signal did not wave in Texas as shortly after receipt of your letter we received our orders to come here, and the rest is pretty much history.

In my ovation to you I did not relate what we were doing.. For several years I have been a Contracting Officer with SAC, in a civilian status, and while in Abilene I was assigned to Dyess Air Force Base. When the position here was publicized I "put in" for it and was accepted.

As you have heard and read,the demise of Bong Air Force Base has created at least midwestern concern. We were very surprised at the action of the SSecretary in cancelling the construction and it certainly has left more than just myself in a quandry. Several of the officers that had been assigned had purchased houwes, we were in the process , and at least one airman had placed his earnest money. So the personal impact, financially, plus the dissolution of all of the ambitions and plans to make this the best base in SAC have left all of us understandably disturbed. I don't know where I will go from here, or whether we will be disposed of in the same manner as the base.....

The affect on the local citizenry was not too great,as characteristicly the strong German element had "played their cards close", some were"burned" but slightly, most were untouched. It was almost comical at the number of "I told you so"s that were iterated on the day following the annoucement, however,today it is a strange and serious thing. You could liken it to living in a two room apartment and waking up to find you had been willed an elephant which the Expressman was bringing in the door. These people are asking that it be returned to the original state and placed back on the local tax rolls as productive farms. There has been much claim that the local economy was better before than during the first phases of construction, when at that time there were at least 800 workmen being paid as much as any one of the local farmers netted in a year, each day. It was apparent to me when we arrived that there was recognizable resistance to the construction of the base, today the faith in the government's covenants is in question, and we are certainly bearing the brunt of local comments.

Of all people, perhaps the most affected is Col. Lancaster, the first assigned person and commander. He was called upon to commit and picture what the base would do for the locality. There was hardly a week without several talks before community service clubs in the nearby cities.

After all of the talks, requests placed on the people, and other liaison his words, in fact his stature as a community figure are gone. (sand in a rat hole)

It is not a very pleasant picture to look out on the surrounding landscape from my office in an old ten-room farn house and see these things, however before coming to the Air Force I was contract administrator for the Army at White Sands Proving Ground. If there was some way to tell these people, in fact all America, action such as we have experienced here is the result of progress in the "art" of military science, it may well be a counter to the soviet propoganda.

I was hoping in response to your letter that we could write you and extend an invitation to you to see our pride and joy next year when things were well underway. My wife thought that perhaps if you were on a vacation you would perhaps have liked to have "gotten away from it all" at times on your vacation and we could have made you at home anonymously. Perhaps,if we again get established at some place of interest, or if we just settle down here in the midwest, our invitation can be validized.

It is hoped that you are enjoying your " sabbadical". I feel sure that when you return to the studio and the cameras that you will be welcomed by all. We miss you.

Incidently, I had forgotten about the flat-tire in the situation that opened our correspondence. Either you keep a detailed set of notes or have one of the most prodigious memories in your field, anyway it was nice of you to reply. Perhaps our paths will cross someplace, someday. If I can be of help at any time please feel free to call on me.

Dear Mr. Nordeen:

Please forgive the delay in answering your letter of May 17. I have been occupied with less important matters.

I do indeed remember our meeting in Germany. There was Bob Capa of Life, killed in Indo-China when his jeep hit a landmine, and Charlie Wurtenbaker of Time, who died of cancer in southern France a couple of years ago. I remember the incident you recall with complete clarity and my memory tells me that we also had a flat tire which some of your boys fixed.

Starting the first of July, I am taking a year off and although I have made no plans at all, I shall certainly make you a signal if my travels bring me anywhere near Texas. If you should be coming to New York, it would give me great pleasure to buy you lunch or dinner.

Thanks again for writing and for your kind words about the program.

DEAR MR. MURROW:

THIS IS THE FIRST TIME THAT I HAVE EVER WRITTEN TO ANYONE IN EITHER RADIO OR TELEVISION, HOWEVER, LAST FRIDAY NIGHT WHEN YOU WERE INTERVIEWING JULIE HARRIS AND HE HAD PLAYED ONE OF HIS WAR-TIME HITS AND YOU HAD COMMENTED HEARING IT OVERSEAS (I THINK YOU SAID "OVERSEAS")...

ANYWAY, IT REMINDEB ME OF AN OCCASION WHEN THE FAST ADVANCE PAST THE RHINE WAS BECOMING STAGNANT, ONE EVENING, LATE, THREE MEN IN A GERMAN MADE CAR DROVE UP TO OUR BIVOUAC NEAR GUNDSENHAUSEN AND REQUESTED SOME FOOD. IT WAS RAINING, EVERYTHING WAS SOAKED, INCLUDING MOST OF MY MEN AS THEY HAD "LIBERATED" A WINERY SOME DAYS BEFORE. THE OUTFIT WAS THE 300TH COMBAT ENGINEER BATTALION..... WE ASKED FOR IDENTIFICATION, ONE WAS YOURSELF, THE OTHER FRANK(?) CAPA OF LIFE MAGAZINE, AND THE OTHER I DO NOT REMEMBER. ANYWAY....YOU MUST HAVE TRAVELED FAR AND WIDE THAT DAY AS YOU WERE, LIKE US, WET, UNSHAVEN, AND SADLY IN NEED OF REST.

AFTER YOU HAD EATEN AND SAT AROUND A WHILE, ONE OF THE MEN PASSED A BOX OF GERMAN MADE CIGARS, THEY WERE NOT THE BEST BUT THEY HAD A SEMBLANCE OF TOBACCO. THESE SEEMED TO HAVE RELAXED YOU AND SOON YOU WERE ON YOUR WAY WITH A FULL BOX OF THE CIGARS AND A FULL GAS TANK.

ONCE WHEN YOU WERE IN SEATTLE I WAS TEMPTED TO CONTACT YOU AND SEE IF YOU REMEMBERED THE INCIDENT. IT IMPRESSED ALL OF US A LITTLE AS WE HAD BEEN IN THE THICK OF COMBAT FROM D-DAY ON AND ONLY AFTER THE WAR WAS ALMOST OVER DID WE SEE ANY WAR CORRESPONDENTS.

YOUR PROGRAM IS SEEN REGULARLY OVER KPAR, SWEETWATER, TEXAS, AND IT IS ONE OF THE "MUSTS" FOR MY FAMILY. I LIKE IT, TOO, WHENEVER, IT IS POSSIBLE FOR ME TO SEE IT. Dear Mr. Murrow:

You are invited to the Island of Jamaica in the West Indies whenever you would like to come for a two-week holiday.

The Jamaica Tourist Board will fly you to Jamaica and back again. While in Jamaica, you will be the guest of Mr. John Pringle in your own fully-staffed villa at Round Hill.

During a brief morning while you are in Jamaica, Mr. Richard Avedon will take some memorable and painless pictures of you. Mr. Avedon is, happily, amusing, and won't bore you. He is also, we think, the best photographer in the world.

We will use the most inspired of the photographs in an elegant, dignified advertisement to attract more people to Jamaica. The first two ads in the campaign have already run in many magazines. One shows Noel Coward standing on a rock in the ocean and the other, Mary Martin sitting on a burro.

Miss Martin and Mr. Coward suggested these poses for themselves as expressions of their own personalities. We assure you that you will be photographed only in a pose which you feel is natural to you, and characteristic of you. And, of course, we will submit photograph and copy for your approval before engraving.

If your schedule permits adjustment, will you join Mr. Avedon in Jamaica sometime between January 15 and April 1? Please ask someone to telephone me and tell me when would be the best time for you.

Dear Ed:

Any doubts that came to mind during the screening at Independence of "From Precinct to President" were dispelled Sunday evening. The event fully lived to your estimation and our hopes. Congratulations to you and your staff - and thanks.

I received some two dozen calls at my home after the show. These were from people of both parties; among them lawyers, doctors, politicians, educators, motion picture producers and businessmen. This was my first experience with a group here where all comments were so unanimously favorable. The Democrats were more than normally fulsome in their praise - the Republicans respectful ~~and~~ in their sober approval - with the usual shadings on both sides.

Let me share several typical comments with you.

A nationally prominent Beverly Hills surgeon: "I was tremendously impressed, had no idea Truman had such charm and scope. I was so won over that I did not even mind his jab at the AMA."

A motion picture producer: "A superb production of a much underrated man who is quickly coming into his own. For a long time I was among those who had been negatively disposed. I have but one criticism of the production: he should not have been sitting in a chair during the entire interview."

A corporation lawyer said: "This for the first time presents President Truman as he is. It is now apparent that the press gave a distorted impression of him. I myself expressed some sour opinions of him in the past, but I see things more clearly now. Also, I am an Ed Murrow fan, and this Sunday I got a real chance to see him in depth."

That is the way it went, Ed, and I hope that my experience reflects the response you will be getting from the field.

With warm regards.

Mr. Edward R. Murrow

Dear Mr. Murrow:

There are too many indications that you are a person entitled to my respect for me to leave things the way they are.

First, let's set the record straight. I wrote to you, marking the envelope personal and confidential. Care of CBS was just a way to reach you. The significance of 'documentary' on the title page of the manuscript is 'a true account which can be verified'.

A former Navy commander and civil engineer, L. Ron Hubbard, pioneered a breakthrough potentially more important to mankind than the one Einstein made a half century ago which eventually unleashed the atom. Hubbard's parallels it but is bigger, because it can - or could - mean that there will soom be individuals capable of intelligent control of atomic forces.

However, Hubbard martyred himself in the process. Now he is driven by misanthropy and fear, and for nearly five years he has been camouflaging the breakthrough by overlaying it with a mock-religious racket which competes for sucker dollars with organizations like the Rosicrucians in periodicals like FATE.

From 1950 through 1953 I was intimately involved with Hubbard's movement, which began with the publication of DIANETICS. I have written a sober, factual account of my experiences, which were shared by other persons of good education and character. I am prepared to stake my reputation, and if need be, my life, upon the truth of the assertion that these events and their implications have been of crucial importance to the destiny of man.

If this slight, highly controversial volume is published, I think a few copies will reach people capable of following through the start which has been made. It seems likely that the general public would take it to their heart as well, because DIANETICS and that half-baked BRIDEY MURPHY sold so well. People are instinctively alerted already to these new avenues of growth.

Do you happen to know of an idealistic but highly practical agent who might find a publisher for me? As I wrote you earlier, those I approached by mail just shied away, although I don't think the manuscript was actually read by anyone capable of recognizing that it is TNT. Of course, what I'd hope for most would be that you yourself would devote a few uninterrupted hours to reading it, just on the chance that I am right....

On my honor, I assure you that the magnitude and future potential of this rates your attention.

Sincerely,

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Here is a bare, factual account of a tremendous adventure. You quoted Whitehead the other night: Civilization without adventure is in full decay. Since this happened to me, I feel that ours has scarcely approached its prime.

I suppose that I could will the correspondence and books and tape recordings and E-meters to the Library of Congress or maybe Oppenheimer's outfit and hope for the best, but I feel that people are entitled to know now that this break through occurred.

I sent the manuscript to a couple of publishers (though not in its present stripped down form) and they said things like 'fascinating, well done, possible best seller' in suggesting that I try somebody else. Nobody investigated me or my documentation or gave evidence of comprehending the implications in what I've described if, as happens to be the case, it is literally true.

Now that I've thought of writing you, my only fear is that you won't take the time to read it through yourself. Please don't let the tone of my letter mislead you. I am alone and I can really use some help, especially advice.

August 22, 1958

Dear Mr. Murrow:

I write to ask you to join me in sponsoring - without obligation - a very significant public event.

Just 100 years ago, Townsend Harris, America's first official representative to Japan, opened up the secret domain of the Shoguns to commerce and cultural exchange with the Western world. A 20th Century-Fox picture, "The Barbarian and the Geisha" based on that phase of the life of Townsend Harris which starts on the China Coast and ends in Tokyo, will have its Premiere at the Paramount Theatre on October 2nd. The entire picture was filmed in Japan and directed by Academy Award winner John Huston.

Just 111 years ago, Townsend Harris founded the City College. He got the State Legislature to charter the "Free Academy" as it was first called, and led the public campaign which resulted in an overwhelming vote by the citizenry of New York City in support of the project.

The Premiere of "The Barbarian and the Geisha" is therefore an event of historic importance both for Japanese-American relations and for the life of The City of New York and its great College. Mr. Spyros Skouras has graciously offered the premiere for the benefit of the students of The City College.

Although not an alumnus of The City College, I am happy to accept the opportunity to serve as Chairman of this Honorary Committee to help a great free college educate many thousands of young men and women, to produce more notables like Dr. Jonas Salk, Justice Felix Frankfurter and Bernard M. Baruch.

With my assurance that no obligation is involved, I hope you will accept my invitation to join the Committee. Do let me hear from you.

Sincerely,

Basil O'Connor

P. S. There will be only one meeting of the Committee - Wednesday, September 10, 3:30 p.m., in the West Foyer of The Waldorf-Astoria. I hope you will find it possible to attend.

MID-QUEENS COMMUNITY COUNCIL

January 3, 1958

Mr. Edward R. Murrow, C. B. S.
485 Madison Av.
New York, N. Y.

Gentlemen:

For the past several years our community has sponsored an area-wide Brotherhood Festival which has attracted the attention of all of Queens. We feel that this Festival, and the manner in which it came into being is newsworthy and hope that there is some way that you can give some coverage to it - radio or television, live or recorded.

Ours is an unusual community in that we have, in a middle-income area; Parkway Village, an international housing development where many United Nations personnel live; Pomonok Houses, an interracial City Housing project; Electchester, a union-sponsored cooperative where we have the beginnings of integrated housing; many small home owners, both negro and white; several all-white garden apartment developments; and Parsons Gardens, an almost entirely negro garden apartment development.

Our theme has been "International, Interracial, Interfaith", and, as you can see from the enclosed program, we have had the sponsorship of every community organization. We have, as well, had the participation of the members of these organizations in every phase of the program, and our overflow audiences of over 1000 people testify to the interest of our community in this event. Equally as important as our program is the latter half of the evening in the gymnasium and lunchroom, where people of different races, creeds and nationality dance, eat and socialize together. There is no admission charge.

We are sure that other areas would be interested in our experiences, particularly this year, with the dramatic events in the South occupying major attention, we feel that the way one community is working together to achieve harmony can be an example to others.

If you are interested in our story please contact me for any additional information, pictures (we have some of the past two Festivals) or help. The Festival this year takes place on February 22nd, a Saturday night, in a local public school.

Sincerely yours,

Bernice Olenick, Publicity Chairman

Gentlemen—

At the suggestion of our Portland Station KWJJ, am writing to request copy of Edward R. Murrow's statement re. the implication that Abraham Lincoln (I believe he mentioned others - perhaps T. Jefferson) could not have been elected had they campaigned via T.V. - due to their "not-handsome" appearance. Also mentioned Mrs. Lincoln not being an asset to A. Lincoln politically. Hope this info will suffice in looking up the article. (Presume it came from U.P. - this was broadcast over KWJJ, Portland about October 19 or 20.

Thank you very much!

To the Congress of the United States

The United States Advisory Commission on Information was created by the United States Information and Educational Exchange Act (Public Law 402) enacted by the 80th Congress on January 27, 1948.

This Thirteenth Report to Congress which covers the Commission's work for the calendar year 1957 marks the tenth year of the Commission's existence. Three of the original members of the Commission, Mark A. May, the present Chairman, Erwin D. Canham and Philip D. Reed have served continuously during the past decade. Sigurd S. Larmon has served on the Commission since January 1954 and Lewis W. Douglas since January 1956.

In past years, members of the Commission have visited posts in Europe, Latin America, the Near East and the Far East.

In 1957 Mr. Larmon visited U. S. Information Service (USIS) posts in London, Frankfurt, Paris, Naples, Rome, and Tegucigalpa. Mr. Reed visited USIS posts in Milan, Paris, Rome, Naples, and Madrid. Mr. Douglas, in a separate trip, visited USIS posts in Madrid, London, and Paris. The Commission's Staff Director attended a joint Department of State-U. S. Information Agency (USIA) conference in Paris which was called to evaluate the impact of the Voice of America in Iron Curtain countries. In addition he inspected three USIS missions in France at Lille, Lyon, and Marseille.

In the past year the Commission met seven times. Five meetings were held in New York City and two meetings in Washington.

In 1957, too, the Commission for the first time met with top Agency officers to examine the Agency's proposed budget for fiscal year 1959. Recommendations were then made to the new Director concerning a number of Agency practices and policies which in the Commission's opinion required modification.

Closer liaison was also established between the Commission and the Congress in order to promote a more fruitful exchange of views between the two bodies. This exchange of views has been most beneficial to the Commission, and every effort will be made to continue to hold these occasional meetings between the Congress and the Commission.

During the past year the Commission undertook new functions which enabled it to develop independent sources of information. These new functions have aided the Commission in maintaining and further developing its independent status.

The Commission is pleased with the appointment of former Ambassador George V. Allen as Director of the U. S. Information Agency. He has taken hold with vigor and is providing the Agency with experienced leadership.

The Agency's two Advisory Committees have continued to contribute their time, energy and suggestions to the USIA. Composed of men who occupy top positions in the American communications and cultural field, they continue to bring to the Agency an invaluable source of expert counsel.

In 1957 the Broadcast Advisory Committee added to its membership the services of Mr. Sylvester L. Weaver, Jr., Broadcasting Program and Management Consultant, New York City. Other members are:

Acting Chairman
Assistant General Attorney

Preface

The main theme of this, the Commission's Thirteenth Report to Congress, is the urgent need for long-range planning in the international information field. This is essential if we are to wrest the initiative from the well planned, long-range, lavishly financed Communist propaganda effort.

This report relates the need for such long-range planning to the Soviet propaganda challenge. This challenge has existed for 40 years. It has been intensified in the last 15 years. It has reached a peak with the launching of Sputnik and other recent Soviet advances. It is truly a long-range challenge.

Matching the challenge, however, are some very real opportunities for U. S. information activity. To help take advantage of these opportunities the report considers the requirements of an effective long-range international information agency, and presents the proposition that the USIA should:

1. Continue its present non-partisan character;
2. Strive to develop closer relations with Congress;
3. Continue its independent status;
4. Recruit and train high caliber personnel who will have the benefits of a sorely needed career system;
5. Have the help of adequate representation funds;
6. Constantly clarify and review its objectives;
7. Do more than it is now doing in making available its specialized knowledge to the formulation and implementation of foreign policy;
8. Begin to wrest the initiative from the Communists and to maintain it in the information and propaganda field.

In the light of these long-range requirements, how does the United States Information Agency today measure up? What are its assets and liabilities?

The report covers both, with special attention to areas of weakness that exist in personnel, in training, in overseas operations and in physical facilities. Particular note is taken of the problem of evaluating the effectiveness of USIA programs.

Having considered strengths and weaknesses the report concludes with the Commission's recommendations for immediate action. These include:

1. Review and re-definition of objectives
2. Appraisal of major themes and programs
3. Steps toward improvement of personnel, including the establishment of a career system
4. Planning for increased East-West exchanges
5. Improving cooperation with private enterprise

It is the hope of the Commission that this report will prove clear and candid. And that it will be helpful to the Congress in appraising the present and future of the United States Information Agency.

THE THIRTEENTH REPORT

OF THE

United States Advisory Commission on Information

The members of the Congress are well aware of the fact that the last 15 years have seen a steady increase in Communist propaganda efforts. They also know that the year 1957 saw Soviet Communism's boldest, most successful challenge to the United States and the free world.

The boldness of the current challenge was given direct expression by Khrushchev in his TV interview in May 1957. He said in part:

> "We want competition and we want the soundest forces to manifest themselves in this competition. We call our system, the socialist system, the soundest force because it is the most progressive and the youngest system . . ..
> "With regard to the ideology of capitalist and socialist countries we have never concealed that there will be a struggle in this field, an ideological struggle . . .. This is a battle of ideas and victory is insured for the idea which will be stronger, more viable, and which will be supported by the people."

This was the bold challenge. It was a successful challenge because the Soviets backed their words with dramatic action. Their success in launching their physical satellites provided a propaganda leverage which has been exploited to the hilt.

Previous Communist challenges often have had negative propaganda value. The Berlin blockade of 1948, the attack on Korea in 1950, and the 1956 brutal intervention in Hungary belied Communist propaganda claims to peace. They cost the Communists friendship and admiration. They were propaganda defeats on which the free world could and did capitalize.

But the Soviet challenge of 1957 has been a propaganda victory. Sputnik provided a solid base for their propaganda output. They had "reached and exceeded" the capitalist countries in this field to which they had given priority.

The members of the Commission are impressed with the seriousness of the challenge to freedom-loving people. It is a double-barreled threat to the free world. One barrel is the evidence of scientific achievement. The other is the linked claim of ideological superiority.

Science to dominate the world . . . ideology to win the minds of men . . . both are essential elements in the Soviet plan of conquest. And it is important to realize that both are the products of carefully developed long-range plans. The Soviet advances in both fields have been persistent, continuous, aimed at specific long-range targets.

Science, Ideology. Both are parts of the Soviet challenge. Both are parts of the Soviet armament. Both must be defended against by the United States and the free world.

This Commission realizes that "first things should come first." Immediate needs call for the speeding up of defense weapons, the mobilization of scientific talent, and the strengthening of NATO. Longer term defenses are of secondary priority. These will include new emphasis on basic research, increases in scientific education, long-range planning in many areas.

The Commission believes that a strong international information program should be high on the United States' list of long-range defense activities.

The reasons for this conviction are threefold:

1. Soviet Communism considers its ideological information program a vital weapon in what Khrushchev called "the battle of ideas." The United States cannot let this battle go by default. And we should not only defend against the Soviet attacks, we should be able to mount an information offensive of our own.
2. The United States may be a year behind the Soviets in missiles. It may be five years behind in mass technological education. But it is 30 years behind in the competition with Communist propaganda.

   The Communists started in 1918 and have been at it ever since. The United States started in 1948. And the gap has not been closed.

   Each year sees the Communists increase their hours of broadcasting, their production and distribution of books, their motion pictures and cultural exchanges and every other type of propaganda and information activity.

   The cost of the Communist propaganda efforts has been estimated at anywhere from $500 million to a billion dollars a year. It is also estimated that they spend eight times as much to "jam" United States broadcasts to Iron Curtain countries as the United States spends to do the broadcasting.

   It would seem that we should start planning to close the gap in this field before it widens further.
3. Finally, despite the success of the Soviet challenge, the Commission believes that there exist both immediate and long-range opportunities which should be seized and exploited. It is possible to respond quickly and effectively to the present Soviet challenge.

   It is important to take advantage of present world conditions that offer the United States a chance to achieve its own victories in the information area.

The Opportunities that Face the United States

In the opinion of the Commission there are five major opportunities which call for positive action. They are:

OPPORTUNITY NO. 1. The chance to turn Sputnik to the free world's advantage.

The Soviet attack on Korea has been called the greatest psychological blunder of Stalin's career. It served to unite and re-arm the free world. Soviet Sputniks and the challenge they represent can have a similar effect.

There is now not only an opportunity but a vital reason to strengthen NATO, and our other alliances in the free world. This will call for a maximum exchange of information at popular as well as official levels.

The need for unity emphasizes the necessity of presenting and explaining the position of the United States not only behind the Iron Curtain but to our friends of the free world. And it offers a new change to restate the fact that the United States does more for the lives of people than the Soviet system can possibly achieve.

Such an approach forcefully carried through could help turn what now appears to be a Soviet propaganda victory into a defeat.

OPPORTUNITY NO. 2. The response to Khrushchev's challenge of "Let us compete."

One of the results of the challenge to compete has been a slight lifting of the Iron Curtain. More visitors are permitted into Russia. More delegations are sent out from Russia. There is some increase of communication between the Soviets and the free world.

The Commission feels that more "people-to-people" communication can only result in good. In those areas of communications more directly under USIA responsibility, the Agency should be encouraged to seek every means of increasing exchanges of information and visitation. It should be constantly alert to new opportunities for action within the Communist orbit.

OPPORTUNITY NO. 3. The increased demand for news from and about the United States.

The Soviet's scientific advances have been news around the world. They have, however, also whetted the appetite of the world for more news about what the United States is doing—and for more information about the United States and its people.

The demand can be met only in part by private news services. Much of it is a demand for exactly the sort of information that USIA produces. It offers opportunity for USIA to help clear up misunderstanding and ignorance of the United States.

Reports from the field indicate an aroused receptivity for books, pamphlets, exhibits and motion pictures. There is now probably more curiosity and concern about the scientific and economic strength of the United States than in the past.

OPPORTUNITY NO. 4. The Ferment in Iron Curtain countries.

The past year has witnessed some interesting shakeups in Communist policy and practice in certain Communist countries. Restrictions have been relaxed to some extent. Such ideas as the importance of individual initiative, greater freedom of discussion and other western ideas are beginning to appear in the Soviet orbit.

These, and other signs, indicate an increased interest among the East European countries, in western ideas, news, and information of all sorts. It represents another opportunity that should not be ignored.

OPPORTUNITY NO. 5. The need for U. S. information activity in Africa.

Much of the continent of Africa remains a wide open field. There is a real opportunity, especially in the central areas to reach the awakening people with long-range information programs.

Teaching English as an aid to combatting illiteracy, for example, should be developed. Other information programs can also be of real help to the people of this continent—and will help to make sure that their progress is along the path of freedom and the free world.

The challenges and opportunities have been outlined. Next the Commission raises the question of what kind of Information Agency can best meet these challenges and opportunities.

What Kind of International Information Agency Does the United States Need?

Considering the challenges and opportunities as they have been outlined above, one thing stands out: the long-term nature of the problem.

As has been said, the Communists have been at it since 1918. The United States foreign information program is ten years old. And the ideological struggle to which we have been challenged by Mr. Khrushchev will not end tomorrow. The Communist program is clearly based on long-range plans. So should be the United States program.

This means that the United States Information Agency should be measured not only in terms of its abilities to meet short-term needs, but more importantly in terms of its capabilities for a long-range program. The Commission believes this question of long-term capabilities should be considered first for the following reasons:

A. Once the fundamental principles of an effective long-term organization have been established and agreed to, it will be simpler to appraise accurately the strengths and weaknesses of the present USIA.

B. Building a sound long-term program is a long job. The Agency already has some of the essentials of such a program. Others need to be developed. The time has come to cease thinking of USIA as a year-to-year operation, and to encourage long-range planning. The first step is to seek agreement on the kind of organization that is needed.

C. The foreign information program, established by Congress in 1948 starts its second decade under new leadership. Careful consideration of long-term needs can help this new leadership toward sound planning for the future.

The Commission, therefore, has addressed itself to the questions: "What kind of an International Information Agency can best serve the interests of the United States in the long struggle ahead? What are the fundamental principles for such an effective long-term organization and program?"

Based on the lessons learned in the past ten years—and on careful appraisal of future needs—the Commission suggests these basic principles.

1. The organization should be non-partisan.

The Information arm of the United States Government should be as completely outside partisan politics as the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

Non-partisan status will encourage continuity of leadership. (USIA has had eight Directors in ten years.) It will make possible more efficient planning and operation. (Budgets, personnel and program volume have shown wide variance in past years.)

Positioning of USIA as a non-partisan Agency will enable it to establish the continuity of policy and practice that is vital for a long-term organization.

2. There should be close and continuous relationship with the Congress.

Acceptance of the Agency as non-partisan will make possible the same close cooperation with Congress that is enjoyed by other non-partisan government organizations such as the Federal Bureau of Investigation. One difference, however, will be the lack of the need for secrecy.

While the Agency of course is and must remain an activity of the Executive Branch of the Government, the Commission believes that relationships with Congress should be close. They should include:

Frequent consultation with Congress. The members of Congress should be encouraged to contribute suggestions for programs and activities. The experiences of Senators and Congressmen who have traveled abroad should be sought.

Discussions with Congress should be held from time to time to keep the Congress informed of foreign information activities. In addition the Agency should discuss with Congress at an early stage any proposed new major information programs.

Deeper accountability of Agency to Congress should be maintained. Budget presentations should be as specific as possible, and related to definite programs, objectives and achievements.

These, and similar cooperative relations with Congress are, in the Commission's opinion, essential to establishing a sound long-term information operation.

3. The international information organization should continue to be an independent Agency.

It appears to the Commission that the first two principles—non-partisan character, and close relationship with Congress—can better be realized if the United States foreign information program continues to have independent status.

This Commission has been in close contact with the information program for ten years. For five and one-half years it was in the Department of State. For the last four and one-half years it has been an independent agency.

The Commission's observations lead to the conclusion that the organization and work of the Agency have been more efficient and more effective during the years of its independent status.

The reasons for these views have been stated in previous reports to Congress. As we said in our Twelfth Report,

> "During the past three and one-half years USIA has proved groundless the fears that it could not operate well if separated from the Department of State. It has evolved methods of getting foreign policy guidance from the Department of State. And it has demonstrated its ability to function in the field as a helpful and important part of the Ambassador's team."

The Commission has observed that in the field there is practically no conflict. The Chief of Mission is in control, and the Public Affairs Officer is an integral part of his operation.

Furthermore, as the need for long-range planning becomes increasingly evident, the Commission also believes that such planning can best be carried out by an independent agency.

4. The international information organization should have a career system.

One of the most essential requirements of a long-range organization and program is the recruitment and training of personnel who can look forward to a career in information work.

A career system, covering both domestic and foreign service personnel, will offer the stability and security that will attract professionally competent people.

Attracting and keeping such people are essentials of any long-range organization. This is particularly true of an information operation where special skills and knowledge are important for international effectiveness.

It is for these reasons that the Commission urges that a career system be instituted immediately.

5. Key personnel should be supplied with adequate representation funds.

Representation funds of a reasonable but not extravagant amount are important working tools to help the United States information program achieve improved effectiveness. They help cement communications-contacts abroad. They contribute toward maintenance of the friendly relations so necessary for the acceptance and use of our information materials and programs. And they are important to the morale of United States personnel who at present must dip into their own pockets to make up the lack. Recent Agency studies show that on the average, overseas officials are reimbursed for only one dollar out of every three dollars which they spend in the performance of their duties.

Both a career system and representation funds will prove to be long-term economies for they will lead to more capable personnel and less personnel turnover.

6. Objectives should be continually reviewed.

Broad objectives for the information program have been defined by Congress in Public Law 402, by the President and by this Commission.

Nevertheless, the Commission feels that some confusion still exists as to the actual purposes of an international information program.

Clarifying objectives can help to clear up confusion. This is particularly important for the long-range objectives which should be clearly spelled out and agreed to by Congress and the Agency.

By establishing mutually agreed upon goals, the long-term growth of the Agency can be according to a definite plan rather than by unplanned expediency.

In addition, short-term objectives which may change as world conditions change, can be judged not only in light of immediate needs, but also in terms of their agreement with or departure from the long-term objectives. Adherence to sound long-term plans and policies will help to avoid the ups and downs which have adversely affected USIA operations in past years.

Two possible objectives of a long-range program appear so basic to United States needs that they have been included as the following and final two principles.

7. The information organization should make available its specialized knowledge at policy-making levels of Government.

Although USIA at all times should be under the policy direction of the Department of State, an effective foreign information agency should have both the opportunity and the ability to offer public relations advice in the area of United States foreign policy. It should be able to counsel as to the probable reactions abroad to United States decisions or announcements. The Agency and its specialized knowledge should be available to help in the wording, the timing, and the presentation of our policies to the world to insure maximum positive results.

8. The organization should help the United States Government take the leadership in worldwide information programs.

In addition to presenting United States policies abroad, and to counteracting Communist propaganda efforts, the Information Organization should provide information initiative for the United States.

With 40 years of experience behind them Communist propagandists have frequently seized the initiative. This forces the United States to react to them, rather than acting positively on its own.

A carefully planned creative United States program could reverse this situation and help to establish United States leadership in this area.

In summary, the basic principles, the essentials of an effective long-term international information program should include:

1. Non-partisan character.
2. Closer relations with Congress.
3. Independent status.
4. Establishment of a career system.
5. Adequate representation funds.
6. Clarified objectives.
7. Making available specialized knowledge at policy-making levels of the United States Government.
8. Providing information leadership for the United States.

In the opinion of the Commission none of these essentials, except for the Agency's independent status, is sufficiently realized at the present time. Improvement in each category is necessary to the planned development of the kind of Information Agency that the United States needs. The sooner a start can be made, the more vigorously improvement can be pursued, the sooner will United States information needs—both short-term and long-term—be achieved.

The foregoing is a general appraisal of international information needs and objectives. It is time now to be more specific. What is the Commission's appraisal of how well the present USIA is serving the United States?

What are the Assets and Liabilities of the United States Information Agency?

On January 27, 1948, the 80th Congress passed Public Law 402:

> "An Act to promote the better understanding of the United States among the peoples of the world and to strengthen cooperative international relations."

Now, a decade later, as the Commission attempts to appraise the strengths and weaknesses of USIA and its ability to carry out the purposes of Public Law 402 there is one fact that emerges above all:

> The greatest asset of the United States Information Agency is its ten years of experience in foreign information activity.

The Commission believes that during those years real progress has been made. Starting 30 years behind the Communists, the United States has built up an organization and facilities that are a sound base for present operations and further growth.

Many mistakes have been made. The United States has had to learn by doing and errors are a natural result of that process. For example, there has often been too much emphasis on United States material achievements and comforts which, in many instances, appeared boastful. But the foreign information program has learned from its mistakes. Many of the early errors are being corrected.

Many successes have been achieved. The ten-year record shows victories as well as defeats. Advances have been made in explaining United States policies and the United States itself to the peoples of the world. For example, the Agency has done well in explaining and in communicating to the world the President's "Atoms for Peace" program. Acceptance for, use of, and belief in United States information material has grown year by year.

This ten-year experience—whether of success or of failure—is an asset that will help in every phase of future operations. It is a background of inestimable help in developing the long-range plans and programs that are so urgently needed.

Experience, however, is a broad and general asset. What are the more specific strengths and weaknesses of the USIA today? In the opinion of the Commission they may be grouped as follows:

Areas of Strength

1. Facilities: Over the past ten years the Commission has observed the accumulating inventory of materials, equipment and other facilities. Among the more important items of this inventory are the following:
   - A. United States information missions in 79 countries and a total of 193 information service posts.
   - B. 155 Information Centers in 64 countries.
   - C. 77 Binational Centers in 25 countries.
   - D. Radio transmitters at 7 locations in the United States and at 10 overseas locations.
   - E. Motion pictures. About 1,100 program films in USIS film libraries.
   - F. 2,542,275 books in USIS libraries, of which 1,764,191 are in English and 778,084 in translations.
   - G. 22 bookmobiles.

H. 68 magazines or editions of magazines produced abroad—18 in English and 50 in foreign languages. The Agency also produces two English and one foreign language publications in the United States for overseas use.

I. The Agency has a complete radio teletype facility at 79 posts for receiving the Agency's wireless file.

J. 225 exhibits of a permanent nature.

As the Agency develops long-range programs, many of these facilities will continue to be useful. Some may be curtailed and others expanded.

2. Staff: A small corps of skilled professionals with up to ten years of experience in foreign information activities provides the nucleus of a strong USIA staff. Around this nucleus is growing a larger group of Americans and foreign nationals, increasingly professional and better able to carry out USIA policies and programs.

3. Audiences reached: Audience surveys are becoming increasingly available. For example, surveys of Hungarian refugees showed a large majority had listened to Voice of America broadcasts before and during the revolution. This coupled with the Russian efforts to "jam" such broadcasts are evidence there may be a growing audience behind the Iron Curtain as in the free world.

   There is additional evidence—such as figures for attendance at exhibits and reports from qualified observers that indicate more and more people are aware of USIA efforts.

4. Acceptance of United States material: Media in other countries are showing a growing tendency to accept United States material for their own use. This leads to the publication and broadcasting of U. S. material to large audiences that otherwise would not see or hear it.

5. Respect for material and staff: Experience and contacts developed over the years are now paying dividends.

There is growing confidence in the accuracy and believability of USIA material. There is also growing respect for the USIS staff among the foreign press and people of other countries. The use of USIS material in the daily press of the world is visible proof.

6. Foreign acceptance of USIS: Information Centers, libraries and other facilities have become familiar and important parts of life in many foreign countries. People are coming to accept them as familiar—and friendly—symbols of the United States abroad.

Areas of Weakness

The Commission believes that the Agency's weaknesses should have greater attention and concern than its strengths.

Certain weaknesses, especially those relating to the Agency's long-term needs, have been criticized and discussed earlier in this report. They included the Agency's past relations with Congress, the need for clarification of objectives, the lack of a career system, and other broad areas.

Objective appraisal of the USIA also discloses other more specific areas of weakness, correction of which is important to improvement both short and long term. These include:

1. Weaknesses in personnel: Despite progress referred to in staffing, the Agency should step up its efforts to improve personnel. In some areas the caliber of personnel is not satisfactory. Those whose performance is inadequate should be replaced.

   The Commission feels that certain areas are understaffed while others may well be overstaffed. Greater critical attention should be given to the Agency's personnel policies and practices, as well as to the quality and quantity of the personnel itself.

   For example, improvement can certainly be made in reassignment policies to avoid wasted time by personnel who have completed a tour of duty and must wait for assignment to their next post.

2. Weakness in training: One of the weakest spots in the Agency's personnel system is its language training. There are simply not enough people in USIS who are adequately equipped to do the job in the field.

   The Commission has been informed that the Agency is seriously working on this matter. Nevertheless, it must be reported at present as an admitted important weakness. The Commission strongly re-states its belief in the necessity for a long-range training program for Agency personnel.

3. Weaknesses in overseas operations: The Commission is concerned that in too many posts USIS efforts are spread too thin. In addition to the major projects there is a tendency to participate in other activities not directly related to basic programs. Concentration of effort on a smaller number of projects, and elimination of the more marginal, less essential activities, would be more economical and more effective.

   In this same area, criticism can also be made of the selection of media used by USIS. The Commission has observed that frequently all media are utilized when concentration on one or two media would be more productive and more economical.

   It would be well if each country reviewed its operations to determine if it is really necessary to use all media in every post. For example, in areas where the literacy rate is low, concentrating on motion pictures and lessening of publication efforts could provide both greater impact and greater economy.

4. Weakness in television: Another weakness is the Agency's inability to use effectively a powerful new medium that is gradually spreading around the world, namely, TV.

   For the past three years the Broadcast Advisory Committee has studied this problem and has come up with recommendations to the Agency. Programs and a plan of action have been recommended by them but the Agency has been unable to develop an imaginative and constructive TV program. This is an area in which long-range planning is essential, in view of the fact that scientists foresee in the not too distant future still more far-reaching developments in world-wide TV communications.

5. Weaknesses in facilities: Certain physical facilities, especially radio, need rehabilitation, repair or replacement. A first rate foreign information program demands first rate equipment or funds will be wasted through lowered efficiency of operation. The Broadcast Advisory Committee has examined this problem and has recommended a long-range plan of rehabilitation in the light of current problems and possible future emergencies.

   In addition there are important parts of the world where United States facilities are just too weak to provide adequate competition to communist propaganda efforts. The Agency's request for new more powerful transmitters needed to strengthen United States broadcasts to critical areas in the Commission's judgment is justified.

6. Weaknesses in evaluation: Efforts at evaluation of the Agency's work is still deficient. However the Agency has started a new program on an experimental basis.

   Four-man "evaluation-teams" have been sent to two countries. Their job is to find facts through surveys, personal interviews, and such other research techniques as are applicable and available in each country. They will provide an appraisal of United States efforts.

   The Commission is withholding judgment on this program until results from the first two teams can be seen and judged.

In the opinion of the Commission, however, evaluation by the Agency of its own efforts will always suffer from the problems inherent in any self-evaluation. Most businesses, when they wish an objective appraisal, seek it from outside independent organizations.

Under Public Law 402, the Commission has the responsibility of providing such objective evaluations where feasible. However, ten years of experience has proved that the limited time available to the Commissioners (all of whom have important responsibilities in business or the professions) is not adequate for complete appraisal.

Therefore, in addition to personal visits abroad by the Commissioners, more detailed studies by competent evaluators are needed.

If the Commissioners could be put in a position to use independent investigators from time to time who would report to them, they would be willing to inaugurate such a program. In this way the Agency might begin to obtain the independent objective audit of its work that has long been needed.

The present strengths and weaknesses of the Agency have been listed.

Next, the Commission turns to certain specific suggestions for prompt action. These recommendations in the opinion of the Commission can help to achieve the following:

A. Bring the Agency more in line with today's needs.
B. Produce a stronger, more efficient organization by helping toward correction of current weaknesses.
C. Serve as turning points in converting the Agency from a short-term type of operation to an effective long-term foreign information program.

Suggestions for Immediate Action

1. Review and redefine objectives

As indicated earlier, the Commission believes the establishment of both long-term and short-term objectives is of primary importance.

Long-term objectives should be reviewed by the Agency with the advice and assistance of Congress and the Department of State.

Short-term objectives necessarily vary in different parts of the world. To be realistic they must be tasks that an information program can be expected to accomplish in each country.

The Department of State, United States Ambassadors, Public Affairs Officers, the Office of Policy and Plans and Assistant Area Directors can contribute importantly to the formulation of short-term objectives.

2. Appraise major themes and programs

The Agency should review current programs to determine which should be continued, which should be dropped, and where new or expanded programs are needed.

In this area the Commission has three recommendations.

A. Such current themes as People's Capitalism, The Family of Man, Free Elections, Atoms for Peace, and United States culture have proved effective. They should be continued and extended to areas where they have not as yet achieved full impact.

B. The program for the teaching of English should be given special attention both as an immediate project and as a part of the long-range activity.

The Commission believes worldwide interest in the English language is one of our greatest assets. Demands for the teaching of "American English" far exceed the supply. The Agency should give this top priority as an independent activity and in cooperation with other countries through Binational Centers.

In addition to the work of the Department of State which has primary responsibility, the Agency, when feasible, should encourage and support American schools which have been established abroad.

C. In light of recent events, the Commission recommends to the Agency that special consideration be given to the possibility inherent in two new themes:

First, an increased emphasis on news of science, research, and technical achievement by the United States and the free world. Particular weight should be given to the way the free world has used science to improve health, welfare and living standards of all people.

In addition, the Soviets have borrowed heavily from the free world's ideas of competition, rewards for excellence, and the spirit of free inquiry in developing their physical sciences. They could now be challenged publicly as to why they had not carried the same free world ideas into the social sciences—human relations, economics, government—where they would be of benefit to the Soviet peoples.

3. Step up personnel improvement

The Agency should start planning now to meet the personnel needs required for a long-range program. This will call for careful selection, planning, and activity in many areas of personnel recruitment and relations. The Commission wishes to call attention to four specific suggestions:

A. The necessity for a career service in attracting and holding high caliber people. This has been discussed earlier in this report.

B. Higher priority of foreign language training. While the Agency has recognized the importance of this, the Commission has observed that other considerations are often given priority over language training.

C. Improvement and speed-up in re-assignment of people returning from the field. Currently many personnel returning to the United States are either misassigned or remain unassigned for far too long a time. This can be corrected by better, longer range planning of personnel assignments.

D. Greater attention to Cultural Affairs Officers (CAOs). The Commission recognizes the importance of the status and duties of the CAO. The Agency's Advisory Committee on Cultural Information, composed of outstanding leaders in American cultural activities, has been most helpful in the cultural programs.

This Committee, and the Commission, agree that Cultural Affairs Officers can and should be key men in the long-range program of the Agency. The Agency should pay greater attention to them, their qualifications, and their careers than it has in the past.

4. Plan for increased East-West exchanges

The Agency should make advance preparation to take advantage of any further lifting of the Iron Curtain. It should be ready for new opportunities for East-West contacts and exchanges of information.

In addition, it should be noted that the U. S. S. R. is opening new areas to tourist travel. The United States Congress has relaxed some of the McCarran Act restrictions. In this atmosphere of encouragement to international travel, the Commission recommends that the Agency, together with the Department of State and other Government agencies and private groups, develop and promote a positive program encouraging tourism to the United States.

5. Improve cooperation with private enterprise

The Commission has observed that the Agency has excellent cooperative relationships with the publishing industry, the movie industry and the broadcasting industry.

Special tribute should be given to the Broadcast Advisory Committee and the Advisory Committee on Cultural Information. The members, distinguished representatives of American industry, professions, and academic life have given generously of their time and have been most helpful.

Relations with some of the wire services have been less than satisfactory. The Agency should do all it can to improve these relations and to establish the principle of "cooperation—not competition."

In addition, the Agency should continue and expand its efforts to be of service to the People-to-People movement and to other private groups and organizations, both at home and abroad, which are actively seeking to improve our international relations.

Budgetary Action

The Commission has neither the responsibility nor the wish to advise on the size of the USIA budget.

The Commission, however, has discussed with top officers of the Agency the budget of fiscal year 1959.

The members agree with the Agency's recommendation for action on the budget to:

1. Provide increases needed to cover higher costs due to inflationary trends abroad.
2. Provide funds to re-institute some of the programs given up to meet 1958 budget requirements, which a year's experience has shown were important to the overall United States program.
3. Provide increases to cover the cost of new or expanded programs called for by the present world situation.
4. Provide for adequate representation funds.

In addition, the Commission believes that the USIA budget should contain provisions for a contingency fund. Such a fund would be for use by the Director for emergencies and for unexpected events which may occur in the rapidly changing international scene. The fund could not be used for ordinary expenses. It would be left unused if circumstances justifying its use did not occur.

The Commission also suggests that budgetary considerations should be an important facet of the development of its long-term character by USIA.

Such long-term planning will help avoid the budgetary ups and downs that have occurred in the past.

Conclusion

In summary, this Thirteenth Report to the Congress of the United States expresses the concern of the Commission in three main areas.

1. The challenges and opportunities that face the free world, and the need for a sound active international information program to meet the challenges—and to take advantage of the opportunities.
2. The need for a long-term information Agency—one that is planned, organized, and equipped not only to meet immediate short-term demands, but to develop and carry on a consistent program in the years to come.

   There is also the necessity that such an organization and program be:

   —non-partisan
   —closely responsive to Congress
   —an independent agency of government
   —offer a career service
   —meet other basic principles to be established by the Agency and agreed to by Congress.
3. Appraisal of the USIA shows many valuable areas of strength. The Commission however is more concerned with the still existing areas of weakness. Examination of these leads to the belief that they can be corrected. Every effort should be made to do so as quickly and efficiently as possible.

The Commission has discussed its views on the United States international information program with the new Director of the Agency. The members of the Commission are in accord with his approach to this assignment.

The Commission also believes that under the guidance of the new Director—with the advice and help of Congress—it is possible for the United States to develop the kind of Information Agency that will in the long run build toward United States leadership in the constantly increasing ideological struggle between Communism and the free world.

U. S. GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE: 1958

U. S. ADVISORY COMMISSION ON INFORMATION
Washington 25, D. C.

REpublic 7-8340
Extension 4576 or 4577

ADVANCE RELEASE: FOR THURSDAY MORNING PAPERS, MARCH 6, 1958

Ten years of experience in counselling the United States foreign information program has led the U.S. Advisory Commission on Information to highlight in its 13th report to Congress the urgent need for long-range planning in foreign information work. "This is essential," affirms the Commission, "if we are to wrest the initiative from the well planned, long-range, lavishly-financed Communist propaganda effort."

The Commission said that recent Communist propaganda successes following the launching of their earth satellites coupled with the call for ideological competition that was enunciated by Khrushchev in 1957, represented a double-barrelled challenge and threat to the free world.

The report points out that the Soviet propaganda challenge which has existed for 40 years, has been intensified in the past 15 years and reached a peak with the launching of Sputnik and other Soviet advances. But, the report emphasizes, matching this challenge are "some very real opportunities for U.S. information activity."

It believes that there is a chance to turn Sputnik to the free world's advantage. The Soviet Sputniks and the challenge they represent can serve to reunite and rearm the free world, just as the Soviet attack on Korea helped to this end.

The report also saw in Khrushchev's challenge of "Let us compete" a slight lifting of the Iron Curtain and a chance for increased communications between the Soviets and the free world.

Another opportunity is seen in the increased demand for news from and about the United States. The Commission pointed out in its report that the Soviet's scientific advances have been news around the world and have whetted the appetite of the world for more news about what this country is doing and for more information about the United States and its people. This demand, it believes, can be met only partly by private news services and offers an opportunity for the USIA to help clear up misunderstanding and ignorance of the United States. Reports from the field indicate an aroused receptivity for books, pamphlets, exhibits and motion pictures and has disclosed a greater curiosity about the scientific and economic strength of the United States than in the past.

A further opportunity mentioned in this report is the need for information activity in Africa, much of which it says remains a "wide open field." It believes there is today a real opportunity, especially in the central areas, to reach the people with long-range information programs that will be of real help to the people of that continent.

Cautioning that it would be a costly error to assume that the Communist threat is only a scientific one, the Commission's report states that "science to dominate the world...and ideology to win the minds of men are both essential elements in the Soviet plan of conquest...both are the products of carefully developed long-range plans. The Soviet activities in both fields have been persistent, continuous, aimed at specific long-range targets."

To successfully meet the Soviet Communist long-range ideological propaganda challenge, the Commission calls upon the U. S. Government to close further the 30-year competitive gap between the level of Communist propaganda and that of the U. S. foreign information effort.

Based on the lessons of the past ten years, the Commission recommends eight principles which the United States information program should adopt:

1. The foreign information program and organization must be non-partisan in the hope that this will encourage continuity in leadership and more efficient planning and operations.

2. Relations with Congress must be closer and continuous, including frequent consultations and discussions.

3. The international information organization should continue to be an independent agency. After observing the operations of the U. S. foreign information program both in the Department of State and as an independent agency, the Commission concludes that an information program operates more effectively when it is independent.

4. A permanent career system is urgently needed in order to attract and retain competent personnel.

5. These personnel must be supplied with adequate representation funds which have been denied to them year after year.

6. The program should continually clarify its objectives.

7. It should make available its specialized knowledge at the policy-making levels of government.

8. Finally, the USIA should assist the U. S. Government in taking the leadership in world-wide information programs.

The Commission's 13th report to Congress also examines the present strengths and weaknesses of USIA and concludes by making specific suggestions for prompt action in order that the Agency may be equipped to meet the long-range challenge of Communist propaganda and ideology. These include:

a) An appraisal of the Agency's major themes and programs. The Commission recommends the vigorous programming of People's Capitalism, Family of Man, Free Elections, Atoms for Peace, and a projection of United States cultural attainments. It urges the Agency to grant the teaching of English a high priority.

   The Commission also calls the Agency's attention to two possible new themes. One would be based on the free world's use of science to improve health, welfare and living standards of all people.

   The second, the Commission points out, would stem from the fact that "the Soviets have borrowed heavily from the free world's idea of competition, rewards for excellence and spirit of free inquiry in developing their physical sciences. They could now be challenged publicly as to why they have not carried the same free world ideas into the social sciences... human relations, economics, government... where they would be of benefit to the Soviet peoples."

b) Step-up personnel improvement by obtaining a career service, giving foreign language training high priority, improve and speed up the reassignment of personnel returning from the field, and give greater weight to the role of the Cultural Affairs Officers in the Agency's total program.

c) Plan for increased East-West exchanges and cooperate with other government agencies to promote and develop a program of tourism to the United States.

d) Improve cooperation and continue to avoid competition with private enterprise.

This 13th report to Congress marks the tenth year of the Commission's existence. Three of the original members of the Commission, Chairman Mark A. May, Director, Institute of Human Relations, Yale University; Mr. Erwin D. Canham, Editor, Christian Science Monitor, and Mr. Philip D. Reed, Chairman of the Board, General Electric Company, have served continuously during the past decade. Mr. Sigurd S. Larmon, President, Young & Rubicam, has served on the Commission since January, 1954, and Mr. Lewis W. Douglas since January, 1956. Because of a recent illness, Mr. Douglas was unable to participate in the preparation of this report and for this reason has not signed it. He has, however, expressed agreement with most of the major points made by the Commission.

Copies of the Commission's report may be obtained from the Commission's staff at the Walker-Johnson Building, 1734 New York Avenue, N.W., Washington, D. C.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Enclosed find a clipping that may interest you. A little explanation is called for, though. Early in the year, when you and some of the other CBS commentators reviewed the year 1958 and its significance on TV and radio, a letter signed "B. Brambeus" appeared in the "B-Mike" column of the Oregon Journal. It derided the text, the clothing of the speakers and termed it a smug, Wall Street atmosphere, or words to that effect.

It aroused my resentment and I replied. When I had given up the idea they were going to publish it I one day, Feb. 17th to be exact, received a phone call from Senator Neuberger's local secretary; she had gotten a big bang out of the letter, which she had just seen, and said she was sending a clipping to the Senator. A number of other people seemed to think it called for applause. Anyway, here it is.

You will be greatly missed at your spot on my radio dial when you leave in July; your broadcast has become a pleasant habit and I look forward each day to your analysis of the news. Have also read what you had to say about television in the New Republic. Change is always good for one and I hope you will enjoy yourself and return refreshed and renewed. Bon voyage!

Cordially,

MOYES: The diatribe against Ed Murrow et al seems to call for an answer. In fact, it appears to emphasize the very need they indicated. This American complacency with the status quo, the ostrich with his beak in the grassroots, is responsible for the backwardness we are just waking up to.

Sneering at "eggheads" and contemptuous referenceby carefree students to "a brain" is a danger we can't afford to make jokes about in this race for survival.

TRUE, I was not at the disadvantage of watching the speakers on TV and so was not distracted by $200 suits and vests (and possibly Brooks Bros. shirts concealed thereunder); I just listened on the radio to what they said in those clear, modulated voices, and the Wall Street tint, if any, that annoyed B. Brambeus was spared me. Next time perhaps he should try it.

I HAVE come to grips with Mr. Murrow in the past, but I respect his brains, as I do those of Sevareid and the others. And I deeply lament the passing of the late Elmer Davis. It cannot be denied, however, that these men are extremely well informed in their fields, have to be keen students and appraisers of the kaleidoscopic world events.

It is a Yankee privilege to give them an argument, but let us not discount their intelligence, their intellectuality or the recommendations based upon them. — ELIZABETH OLSEN.

Dear Mrs. Olsen:

Your wonderful son has dispatched to me the covers for my golf clubs. If my game were as good as the covers, I would be a professional.

I write to thank you very much indeed, and to tell you that every time I play golf in the future, the covers will remind me of the warm friendship and affection I have for your son.

Thank you, again.

Dear Ole:

The golf club covers are magnificent. I am writing your mother today. You will please write me and tell me something I can send to her as an expression of my appreciation.

I am off to London, Paris and Berlin for a quick trip the end of this week. Should be back in about ten days.

About the restaurant, I am going to be without income for the next year starting July 1, but would still like to have a small part of anything you undertake.

Sincerely yours,

DEAR ED:

I CAME OVER TO KLAMATH FALLS YESTERDAY TO SEE MY MOTHER AND SHE HAD YOUR GOLF COVERS COMPLETED.

THE WOOL IN THESE COVERS WAS MANUFACTURED IN YOUR NATIVE STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA AT THE CHATHAM WOOLEN MILLS, ELKIN N.C. (IN THE HEART OF THE YADKIN VALLEY AND THE LAND OF THE HUSH PUPPIES) THE KNITTING WAS DONE BY A NATIVE OF NORWAY WHO SETTLED IN YOUR ADOPTED STATE OF WASHINGTON AND NOW LIVES HERE. THE DESIGN AND PROMOTION WAS DONE BY THREE OF A KIND OLSON, NOTORIOUS ROGUE RIVER RAT AND PARTNER OF THE NOTED GOLF DUO OF MURROW AND OLSON WHO SOUNDLY DEFEATED THE HOGAN-STODDARD TEAM FOR THE PACIFIC NORTHWEST TITLE LAST JULY.

HOPE YOU WILL LIKE THEM.

SINCERELY.

Dear Ed:

It was quite a surprise to hear of your taking a years leave of absence, but if anyone needs a rest you certainly do. You will probably end up working harder than ever.

Our good friend Tom's passing was quite a severe shock, but he went out without suffering--just the way he wanted to. Cathryn is getting along as well as can be expected, but the two kids are going to give her some anxious moments without Tom around.

I am living in Medford now and am endeavoring to find a good location to open an eating establishment or a combination restaurant and lounge. If I should find the right spot would you still be interested in investing some money as you indicated to me last July? If so, how much would you feel like investing?

I would rather start small and build the business up and expand when profits warrant it. In order to protect you I would incorporate, take a salary for operating and would put the profits back into the corporation.

I would appreciate hearing from you at your earliest convenience Ed, and give my best regards to Janet and Case. What are you planning on doing from July 1st on?

Sincerely,

Harold Olson

Dear Ole:

For God's sake, don't get yourself too well known, else your fame will spread to the East and the odds will be reduced. I am delighted with the good news and I am sure that next year, one way or another, we will meet up again.

Dear Ole:

Many thanks for your note. Casey and I are still reminiscing about the trip, and I shall long remember our golf match in which we humbled the proud and arrogant.

The knee is fine, and for the last few days I have been handling a bulldozer with rather more skill than I did my putter.

May be off to the Middle East some time in the next couple of weeks, but will make arrangements about the Scotch being forwarded.

Dear Ed:

The news about the Middle East situation may make it necessary for my boat partner to fly over and get those boys straightened out, so I better get this letter out before you leave.

Ed, I want to thank you for the wonderful time we had on our trip down the Rogue River and our great victory over those two S.B.'s who were so sure they were going to give us such a Royal yensing. Old Stod is still talking about that golf match.

Another thing that impressed me on the trip was the way Casey molded himself into the situation. An intelligent, courteous and well schooled boy exposed to characters of all types, as he was, and being able to adjust himself quickly -- is a gift which will be of great value to him during his lifetime.

Your generous offer to help me on some type of business venture is deeply appreciated. When it does come about, I will guarantee you that I will put out all the honest effort within me to make a success of it for all concerned.

Monday, I sent the book on Sauvies Island to Casey, and it should be in his hands by now. Give Casey and Janet my warmest regards and the best to you.

Sincerely,

Ole

P.S. No hurry but when you order your next shipment of that famous Scotch, send me a half or whole case collect or I'll reimburse you by check.

Did your knee recover yet from the bruises I so generously inflicted?

Olson Scores Ace

Harold Olson, Portland, picked up his second ace in two weeks Wednesday when he scored a hole-in-one on the Portland Golf Club's 17th hole. Dan Kienow and Jim McDowell, both of Portland, witnessed the 118-yard drive with a nine iron. Olson picked up his first ace last July 16 on the 139-yard No. 4 hole of the Portland course.

Dear Ed:

Your being my favorite golf partner makes it necessary that I inform you about my good fortune on the golf links the past week.

On Wednesday, July 16, I hit a soft 7 iron ten feet past the hole on Portland Golf Clubs 4th hole. Before my opponents could say "Lovely shot Ole", the ball drew back into the hole for an ace, the first one of my life. Than to add a little frosting to the cake, I went out yesterday and hit an 8 iron two feet in front of the stick on the 17th hole and in proceeded to roll in for another hole in one. Boy, are those squareheads lucky.

The irony of it was that neither Stoddard or Hogan were along to pay me 10 points at the coughed price.

I have my oversized Levi's, red timber faller suspenders, worn out sandals, checkered shirt and wide brim straw hat all packed and ready to travel in a moments notice. (In case Stoddard should wander by, I took the precaution of packing my gear in a leak proof duffel bag) Murrow we are now ready for those pigeons at Pine Valley, Burning Tree, Winged Foot etc. Be sure an specify that the backwood boys of the Pacific Northwest collect 10 points on holes in one.

Stod has been very busy catching up on back work and last week end his close friend and back door neighbor, Crosby Owen, had a fatal heart attack and Tom was burdened with arranging for the services and countless other details. Needless to say, Old Stod looked a little fagged out when I saw him yesterday.

I hope Janet's mother is recovering from her accident and your health is good. Extend my best to Janet and Casey and keep your putter warmed up.

Sincerely,

Ole

Dear Tom:

The trip down the Rogue River with the Stoddard-Murrow group will live in my memory as one of the most pleasant experiences in my life. I deeply appreciate your thoughtfullness in asking me to go along.

Both Murrow and I were somewhat embarrassed for the one sided pasting we gave you and Hogan in the 18 hole golf match. In order to protect yourself in any future golf matches or any other form of competition including snooker, I want to let you in on a secret known only to a few people.

The founders of that great college fraternity. Kappa Sigma, set up the greatest moral and character building program in the history of the world. The training is so intense and exacting that it stays with one throught life enabling us to hurdle any obstacle before us. This is what you and Hogan were up against— you were beat before you started. Murrow and I, both being Kappa Sigs, are also good sports and would therefore allow you and any partner you choose, to challenge us any time you feel up to it.

Honest Harold Olson

HANDWRITING ANALYST

17 February, 1959

Dear Mr. Murrow:

You have probably received many such requests as I am about to make, although I prefer to believe that mine is in a class by itself. For this reason, I hope you will show the kindness I know you to be capable of, which I have seen in your face, in your actions, and am sure will be revealed in your handwriting.

Briefly: I need a specimen of your handwriting; a few lines in ink on unruled paper with your signature, for my book which is contracted to come out this Fall. (It will be my 3rd.) In return for it, I shall be glad to prepare an analysis of it. It would be for me like going forth on an exciting adventure.

So that you will know whoI am, what I have done, and something about my art (although I'm sure you must know something about it)-- I am enclosing my folder. I hope you will find time, in your very busy life, to read it. True, it was designed for commercial purposes but it tells the story, nevertheless, and I need not explain to you the necessity for impinging on the commercial world. Many of my clients are businessmen, bankers, industrialists, although my greater interest is in working with psychiatrists on emotionally disturbed patients. But the object in my writing you is not to tell you about my interests, except to emphasize my great interest in you as a person who has made many valuable contributions toward making the world a better place in which to live. In this, a great majority of people will concur so it is not designed to flatter.

I shall look forward to getting your handwriting specimen and want you to know how grateful I shall be for it,

Most sincerely yours,

What Is Graphology?

. . . "the art or science of deducing character, disposition or aptitudes from handwriting . . ."

Every gesture a human being makes gives a clue to his character; the way he walks, talks, laughs—and writes. He writes unconsciously, without sensing the formation of letters or the words he makes, concentrating on the text. And he, therefore, reveals more about himself this way than in any other single gesture. His handwriting represents congealed integrated behavior. It can also be called mind-writing since it is a composite picture of the way his mind works.

It takes the practiced eye of the trained graphologist to interpret these graphic elements accurately. Such an expert will take into consideration every stroke made with the pen; whether it be the single dotting of an "i", pen pressure, upper and lower loops, "t" crossings, size of writing, margins, spacing, slant, rhythm, base line, connecting strokes, small letters, capitals, finals, or the entire specimen as a unit.

The reason a person's handwriting lends itself so well to psycho-diagnosis is: (1) It is permanent. (2) It is portable and can be examined in a laboratory. (3) It cannot be consistently dissimulated. (4) It has the very important advantage of affording a possibility of leisurely and detailed examination without the necessity of the writer's presence. (5) It definitely represents the particular method with which an individual makes his approach to his fellow men. As one famous psychologist said: "Handwriting symbolizes the way from me to you." (6) It is the only personality clue that affords an opportunity of investigating the development and evolution of the personality over a period of time.

Self-knowledge is as important as knowledge of our employees. And because a graphological report can reveal our basic personality and abilities on a scientific basis, it should become invaluable to every thinking man and woman as an objective index to character.

Nadya Olyanova

Who Is Nadya Olyanova?

TIME Magazine, in its inimitable style, called her: "U. S. No. 1 Graphologist, author of Handwriting Tells . . . radiorator and analyst for Philip Morris (and others), one-time personnel adviser to Standard Oil of California (and others), psycho-diagnostician of New York's Community Church Mental Clinic . . ."

N. Y. WORLD-TELEGRAM feature writer Earl Sparling said of Olyanova: (headline) "MAGNATES LEAN ON HER IN HIRING EMPLOYEES."

ESQUIRE Magazine, in its Manhattan Round-up feature wrote: "Olyanova's no slouch on employment problems. She has on her roster of clients many large firms who have used her talents to decide whether or not a man should be employed. With devastating accuracy she will produce a picture of the man that might dismay him, did he but know. Even executives who were reluctant, at first, to believe in her system were brought to the conclusion that she had something.

"Nadya Olyanova, with the inmost hidden secrets of humanity at her fingertips, is not the Delphic Oracle type . . . She studied with Dr. Alfred Adler, and it was through the science of personality that Olyanova finally entered into the realms of graphology, occupational advice, and surveys through handwriting into the psychiatric field . . ."

Dr. Alfred Adler once said of her: "Nadya Olyanova is to the field of graphology what Michaelangelo was to art . . ."

Olyanova's book, Handwriting Tells, is used as a textbook. She is currently writing another one soon to be published.

. . . She worked for Northwestern University, selecting eligibles for scholarships from handwritings.

. . She has been published in national magazines including Cosomopolitan; helped countless numbers of people through her radio broadcasts.

. . . Olyanova has done extensive research on psychiatric problems, with special emphasis on alcoholism; written articles on the subject, attended seminars at Yale University, worked with problem drinkers.

Potential brides submit their own and prospective husband's handwritings to learn whether they are compatible.

College students are guided vocationally by her graphological findings.

Psychiatrists use her analysis as an aid in diagnosing mental patients.

Many bankers and top executives do not hire a man for a job without first submitting his handwriting for analysis to Olyanova.

Reduced Facsimiles of Bankers' Signatures

From a series of articles by Olyanova in The Southern Banker.

"Your past contributions on the anaylsis of handwriting from the signatures of prominent bankers created more frequent and favorable comment than anything we have tried . . . It was surprising and in many cases uncanny how you depicted a man's character from such a meager specimen of his handwriting . . ."

Haynes McFadden, Publisher
The Southern Banker
Atlanta, Ga.

"Your analysis of the applications which we have forwarded to you in the past have proven to be a very valuable aid in the selection of new people for positions in our bank . . . We find that your analysis has been so accurate in those which we have employed that we have decided to forward you for analysis future applications before making any commitments."

David L. Brumback, President
Van Wert National Bank
Van Wert, Ohio

"The mechanics of your profession is still a major mystery to me but the results have been so eminently satisfactory that I am no longer concerned with the means. In reviewing present personnel or prospective employees, your counsel is most helpful and the only serious mistake I have made in this field was when I did not wait for your analysis to come . . . My advice to those who have personnel problems (and who does not?) is to put a few cases through your mill. They will be convinced."

L. A. Tobie, President
Meriden Savings Bank
Meriden, Conn.

"Although originally doubtful of the value of your services in connection with personnel work, I have had some experience with you along these lines which removed any doubts. Judging from these results I am satisfied you can be of great help."

Herman F. Hahn, President
Union Bank & Trust Co.
Los Angeles, Calif.

"Your keen-sighted and sound character analyses have amazed us, especially in those cases where we have asked you to analyze the writing of older employees whom we knew intimately . . . It is absolutely uncanny how accurately you pointed out the quirks, frailties, good points and bad . . ."

Hugo E. Birkner, Vice Pres.
Davey Tree Expert Co.
Kent, Ohio

"Your analyses and advice have been of tremendous help to us, and I cannot imagine any busy executive doing without them.

P. H. Kuyper, President
Rolscreen Company
Pella, Iowa

A Superior of a Franciscan Monastery says:

"In advising those who have sought pastoral guidance from me, it has often been necessary to assess fundamental characteristics and hidden aptitudes . . . and in this connection your analyses have proved most valuable."

Father Joseph, O.S.F.
Little Portion, Mt. Sinai, L. I.

From New York City—a Psychiatrist:

"The analyses you have made on my patients have been so good and so charged with insight and understanding that I do not hesitate for one moment to say that you are the master of a technique which is eminently suitable not only for the understanding of human nature, but for its therapeutic influence."

W. B. Wolfe, M.D.

From Canada—a Consulting Engineer:

"Your keen analyses and advice have been of tremendous aid to me and I do not hesitate to recommend your services to those with problems."

Arthur Surveyor

From Cleveland, Ohio—Another Banker:

"You have aided us immeasurably and at crucial times . . . Your insight has been little short of supernatural . . . utterly astounding. You are, no doubt, a great source of encouragement in the lives of others as you have been in mine.

Dear Sir:

Our Carnegie club is holding a discussion on a statement attributed to yourself regarding our nation being in mortal danger.

The subject of the discussion is, "What are the mortal dangers referred to." You can imagine how inspiring it would be to have a statement from yourself as to those dangers.

Our meeting will be on the 16th of this month. Would you have time to drop me a line stating briefly a list of dangers? The subject was my suggestion, therefore I am writing.

Yours very truly

ONE WORLD COUNCIL, Inc.

OXford 5 2488

YOU ARE CORDIALLY INVITED to participate in the coming One World Forum of lay citizens, to be held in Monte Carlo, July 22-26, 1958.

THIS MEETING, called by the One World Council, Inc., is planned as a battle in the crucial struggle FOR MEN'S MINDS. This is the war we must wage today if mankind as we know it is to live tomorrow.

THE MONTE CARLO FORUM will be a call to arms in the fight against humanity's arch foes: FEAR, HATRED, PREJUDICE, VIOLENCE, CRUELTY, IGNORANCE, POVERTY, DISEASE and what Alfred Nobel called "Mankind's enemy number one – stupidity!"

YOU MAY COME as a delegate or as an observer – or both.

You will become familiar with the global network of One-World activities already at work; you will help adapt them to new situations in different locales, advance suggestions based upon current trends, and establish a basis for exchange of correspondence and information between your own and overseas groups. Conscious of the urgency of our times, you will have opportunities to participate in any or all activities consistent with the "One-World" Plan for amelioriating conditions that breed wars of violence.

THIS WILL BE THE SECOND great international meeting of its kind. The San Remo "One-World" meeting of 1950 was hailed in many countries as the "hope of the world." It is time now for a second meeting ... at Monte Carlo ... where a royal welcome awaits us ... and a visit to the International 1958 World Fair in Brussels. For participation, mail the enclosed application – now!

Sincerely yours,

What Will Happen At The ONE WORLD FORUM – 1958

As a DELEGATE from your group (we assume that it is non-political, and not committed to any totalitarian ideology), you will help determine the program and procedure of the One World Forum at the Agenda and Organization Meetings held before departure for Monte Carlo, in New York and, together with delegations from other countries, in Brussels. Suggestions and proposals for the Meeting are requested now, and should be submitted to Committee headquarters before May 26, 1958.

DELEGATES will enjoy the many informal get-togethers – international social gatherings, group excursions and trips, seminars, etc. to encourage the exchange of views and experiences between people from different countries and backgrounds. Representatives of U.S. nationality groups will function as "One World Interpreters" between American and foreign delegations, and furnish convincing evidence, by their very presence, of the possibility of building one world from many peoples.

At the Agenda Meetings, every Delegate will be assigned to one or several working committees, – on mutual aid, cultural exchange and human relations projects, inter-group cooperation and many other areas of one world achievement. At the ONE WORLD FORUM itself, each Delegate should

1) become acquainted with the global network of one world activities as developed here and abroad, studying particularly those projects which may be of interest and benefit to his own group and community.

2) help develop, on the basis of the experience gained in his own group and community experiments, projects which may be adapted to the needs of communities abroad.

3) Establish a basis for exchange of correspondence and information between his own and foreign groups.

RESULTS of the ONE WORLD MEETING will include

a) permanent working committees on correspondence, information and projects on which organizations in different countries will cooperate

b) reports of each delegate to his groups and own community – a continuing process of one world education

c) further impetus for this "world neighborhood project," which should develop into a round-the-year and round-the-globe effort to promote the "grass-roots" basis of One World.

OBSERVERS as well as DELEGATES will also attend the GALA EVENTS

THE ONE WORLD COUNCIL
was founded to help in forming and cultivating a climate of opinion in which men of good will can work together for ONE WORLD in the spirit of Woodrow Wilson, Wendell Willkie, and Franklin D. Roosevelt, It continues the work begun by the One World Committee founded in 1944. It is an independent, non-profit, non-partisan organization incorporated under the laws of the State of New York.

THE ONE WORLD COUNCIL
repudiates the theory that mankind must submit to the forces which seem to consign it to doom. We believe that we can find ways to defeat these forces by mobilizing the moral and intellectual resources of men and calling to our service the historic and social forces which are on our side.

We accept neither the doctrine of inevitability nor the solution by tyrannical power. Our heritage has its roots deep in Magna Carta and the Declaration of Independence. We are dedicated to the principles of the Bill of Rights. Our belief is that free men by patient thought and moral insight can find a way to a ONE WORLD community in which individual independence and national integrity can be preserved.

To find this way we must confer. All men, and all kinds of men, must confer across all national and racial boundaries. We must search each other's minds and candidly examine each other's views. Out of the counsels of many there can emerge the concept and form of the system of law and order in which a free One World community may thrive.

- Never was there an hour when humanity needed more a rediscovery of the vision and faith of the sages, seers and prophets who across the ages have kept bright the vision of the brotherhood of man, the ideal of peace, and the power of reason and good will to create the great community.
- It is an hour for the voice of ONE WORLD TO MAKE ITSELF HEARD. We invite you to Monte Carlo in the belief that there this voice will have a powerful sounding board.

is organizing the Monte Carlo Forum, July 22-26, 1958, to serve these purposes by providing an opportunity for men and women of good will from all countries to meet and share their thinking.

This meeting bids fair to outshine even the success of its predecessor meeting held in San Remo in 1950. At that meeting the Alfred Nobel Park and Alfred Nobel Avenue were officially opened and dedicated along with the beautiful villa in which Alfred Nobel spent his declining years. A visit to these shrines will be among the thrilling experiences of those attending the International Monte Carlo Forum. American ONE WORLD visitors may avail themselves of special travel arrangements and rates provided by the ONE WORLD Council.

Mr. Edward R. Murrow

New York City, New York

Dear Mr. Murrow:

The people of Alaska are staging a giant Statehood Jubilee May 24th for the purpose of bringing attention to our cause of Statehood. There will be hundreds of Alaskans present, all with one purpose in mind; that of acheiving immediate Statehood. This, of course, is an extremely important event to us.

It is also important for the Alaskan citizenry to know there are people like yourself, Mr. Murrow, who stand behind our gigantic effort. We need an occasional boost in morale. A telegram from you, to be read that night to the assembled guests will provide that necessary boost. Will you help?

If you will send your telegram to Mrs. Sewell F. Faulkner, 1121 7th Ave. Anchorage, Alaska, in advance of the above mentioned date, it will reap great rewards in friendship from the people who so urgently need your help.

Thank you so much for your interest,
Sincerely,

Robert W. Retherford

Dear Mr. Oppenheimer:

I write to thank you for your thoughtful letter of May 27 and for your check drawn to the Harold Taylor Fund, which I have forwarded to him.

I am disposed to agree with the main line of your contention regarding the Russian economy. However, I see no possibility of the Russians permitting the operation of a "Buy Now, Pay Later" system, unless they should deny their own dogma and doctrine. By that I mean their political and economic objectives. There is no doubt that the Russian people would like more of the good things of life if their government is in a position to dole out these good things sparingly while devoting the major portion of their gross national product to purposes that serve the national interest rather than the welfare of the individual.

Thank you again for your stimulating letter.

Sincerely yours,

Dear Sir,

Please permit me the following remarks a-propos your news broadcast of tonight. In your discussion of the new british-russian trade agreement and the clues it permits us concerning the changing evolution of the russian economy, I missed one line of argument. The reasons for being for or against this agreement, as listed by you did not include one, which I find to be the most compelling of all, namely that, in my opinion, it is possible, that the best hope for preventing the next war may well be a rising standard of living in the Soviet Union. We in America pride ourselves on the fact , that we are a nonagressive nation. But this has not always been so. Examples should not be hard to find. The indians, the british empire, Spain, Mexico etc have all felt our expansionary aims at times. It seems to me, that our agressiveness as a nation disappeared mostly after we had reached our higher living standards. To put it into a real Madison Ave Type slogan, I believe the way to prevent the next world war is to introduce BUY NOW, PAY LATER into the russian economy. What you and others have lately decried as american flabbiness, would, I think, result as surely in Russia if this type of economy got started there. Already, we think Mr. Kruthchev has at times been forced to make concessions to the educated elite of civil servants, scientists and managers in Russia

Here in America we just go a little further and make concessions to that much larger group, the american consumer. I would refer you to our war effort during the second world war, which certainly was quite sufficient to win the war, but still was way below our real capacity. Why? As a concession to the american people in their capacity as consumers only. A bigger war effort might have saved some american lives and could conceivably have been sold to the public on that basis. But it would certainly have meant many concessions by the consumers generally and politicians being what they are believe in the art of the Possible.

I am most willing to be convinced , that I am wrong in this my theory, but have so far not found a good enough argument to drop this one. A further supporting argumnet could be made out of the behavior of the germans before and after the second world war. Hitler happened during a period in Germany, when unemployment was higher than ever. These same people today in western Germany are much more intrigued with production and consumption and conquering world markets and not too happy about having an army again. While the people in the eastern half are still much more militant and desirous of obtaining the western standard of living.

My wife and I caught you and some of your friends on a taped radio broadcast of the dinner in honor of Dr. Harold Taylor. Never before have we heard such pure enjoyment in your familiar voice. Enclosed please find check for $ 5.00 for the Harold Taylor fund, it might buy a book.

Dear Sir,

Having read in the newspapers about your plans for yourself for the next year, I wish to take this opportunity to thank you for trying to open some doors at CBS for my suggestion concerning an educational show with scholarships as prices last year. Now I understand the obstacles better.

I further would like to say, that I felt it as both a pleasure and a privilege to have worked with you for some years on both " See It Now " and " Person to Person ". When you return and can again use a good engineer, it would please me, if you would call on me, no matter where my services might be useful.

Hoping your next year fulfills all your expectations, I am with best regards Kurt.

Orlow, D. Lincoln

January 29,1958

Sir:

I trust this letter will deserve your attention.

I have in mind erroneous references on the part of the press, radio, television, speakers and literature in general, pertaining to the former empire--Russia, reconstituted as as Union of Soviet Socialist Socialist Republics, also formally and officially referred to as Soviet Union, as the result of the Russian Revolution of 1917. To refer to that country as Russia or even Soviet Russia is a misnomer, unless reference is made to what is geographically called Russia proper, officially designated as Russian Soviet Federated Socialist Republic, one of the largest Soviet Republics, a component part of the union of fifteen separate socialist republics, each republic being linguistically, geographically, culturally and governmentally distinct, and being only politically and ideologically associated with each other in maintaining a structure of society based upon Socialism as taught by Marx, Engels and Lenin, hence the connotation Socialist, subject, of course, to modification as progress and modern conditions may require, with the ultimate goal--Communism.

Incidentally, it must be stated that in official statements, documents or diplomatic communications or utterances that take place, no where and at no time, in referring to the Soviet Union by its government or by any other government, including, of course, that of the United States of America, the name Russia is being used, because Russia as such, that is, as an entity no longer exists.

Again, incidentally, besides USSR as a whole, there are two of the fifteen Soviet Republics, namely, the Ukrainian and Belorussian are members of the United Nations, albeit members republics comprising the Soviet Union.

I trust it is not too immodest on my part to say that I have, by the foregoing, factually, contributed to clarify the frequently misconceived important facts in relation to the matter in question.

Respectfully yours,

D. Lincoln Orlow

Gary Author Is About To Have Another Authentic Thriller Published.

SEVERAL BIG PUBLISHERS ARE VYING FOR THE RIGHTS TO PUBLISH IT.

Rewardingly jubilant with success of his sensational book "Red Wedding," D. Lincoln Orlow, Gary author-lawyer, under the nom de plume of Damon Orlow, is readying his new literary effort, a sequel to "Red Wedding," tentatively titled "White Wedding, Et Cetera."

Orlow has reason to hopefully predict that his new book, in scope, range and cognition, will surpass "Red Wedding," which, it will be recalled, was, several years ago, published by Great Books Foundation publishing house, and at the time was its best seller. It was warmly received, acclaimed and praised by literary critics, reviewers, and the press here and abroad. "Red Wedding" is variously, but in the same vein, glowingly described as: work of art, three-dimensional, breathtaking, excellent, delightful, fascinating . . .

Parenthetically, Orlow, being a Hoosier and Garyite, will have, incorporated in his new book a chapter or so, depicting some noteworthy local episodes and incidents.

Reverting to "Red Wedding," it will not be amiss to requote typical, fragmentary comments:

New York Times—"Damon Orlow's 'Red Wedding' is like an operatic drama . . . It is a cavalcade in in words so alive that the reader is swept into the emotion of the characters . . . is a ripened, mellowed work of art, like Gorky's 'Childhood' and Tolstoy's 'Resurrection' . . . Twenty years seems a long time to spend on a book . . . But when you savor the quality of 'Red Wedding' you feel that even a lifetime is not too long to bring forth the folk soul . . . Every reader of 'Red Wedding' will rejoice in the friendship that inspired this book."

Chicago Tribune—"It has been left to a praticing attorney in Gary to answer that vitally important question: What sort of people are those Russians? . . . a frank, delightfully readable book . . . excellent story."

Henry Beston, renowned author—" . . . an honest holding of the mirror to a peasant community . . . and characters—they are three-dimensional."

In Orlow's home town, Gary, Indiana, the editor of the Gary Post-Tribune, H. B. Snyder, in whose paper "Red Wedding" was highly reviewed, in a personal letter to the author, wrote: " . . . with maturity, you have been able to see the humor and the tragedies in perspective . . . gay and interesting . . . informative and fascinating reading."

Professor Volodymir Batchynsky, coincidentally, author's co-native, praisingly calls "Red Wedding," "breathtaking . . . adding, " . . . I bow my head before you . . . "

At the invitation of book stores, beginning with Gary Book Store, the author spent weeks autographing his book at Marshall Field, Carson Pirie, Brentano's, The Fair, in Chicago and other places.

At a lavish autographing party in the Field Building, Chicago, author Orlow was greeted by a host of press representatives, and interviewed on major radio stations from coast to coast.

To the author's awesome surprise, he was feted by literary personalities in Conrad Hilton Hotel and the fabulous Pump Room, Ambassador Hotel in Chicago.

Incidentally, "Red Wedding" so moved Mrs. Winthrop Rockefeller, affectionately called "Bobo," that she telephoned the author long distance, and wrote a personal, congratulatory letter, expressing a desire to meet him.

Famous Dr. George W. Crane, writer of the widely read syndicated column, "The Worry Clinic," not to mention his other works, wrote: "The city of Gary should be proud to know it has a distinguished author."

One disappointing element of "Red Wedding" is that publishers regretfully informed Orlow that a great mail-order house reconsidered a tentative order for sixty thousand copies of "Red Wedding," just because the book contains episodes involving sex, and although the author treats the inevitable subject euphemistically and with tenderness, the ghost of Anthony Comstock prevailed, a lamentable sign that some people in high places in this age should suffer from intellectual immaturity, if not bigotry, ignorance, and superstition.

My dear Brother Ed,

Your words of praise for B.I.S. after the luncheon for Dr. Charles Hill were deeply appreciated. So too was the last paragraph of your letter of January 7th.

You know, without my telling you, how much your words of commendation mean to me, but I cannot refrain, nevertheless, from thanking you for them once again.

Your documents were indeed helpful to both Collingwood and Schoenbrun, and I say you my thanks for your generous comments.

My dear Rhodes Jd.

I should have written to you long ago to thank you for your great kindness in sending me your "I Can Hear It Now" recording of Winston Churchill's Wartime Speeches, and for giving B.I.S. permission to make use of this outstanding material. My colleague, Rodney Chalk, Director of our Radio & TV Division, has already written to express his appreciation & gratitude.

One reason why I delayed writing was to enable me to hear your "Years of Crisis" broadcast, & to listen to you & your Superb CBS team at the D.P.C. today, before dropping you this note. I listened, & watched, last Sunday the CBS, NBC & ABC year-end shows &, with no disrespect to the opposition, whose shows were excellent, I must say that yours was far & away the best — as it always has been true since I can remember. Congratulations!

Ed, for & for all.

Bob Dixon & I were talking about you at lunch today & I want to tell you what I told him about you, namely, that there is no man on either side of the Atlantic for whom I have a greater respect & affection than I have for you. Bob said something similar himself. And also told me what fun he had shooting with you at Quaker Hill.

Wishing you, dear Casey a Happy, Healthy & Hope, a Peaceful New Year,

Yours, as ever

Brother Bill

P.S. I thought Charles Collingwood & David Schoenbrun were very good on the Common Market & Free Trade Area & hope my little billet-doux came in useful. Developments over the weekend were very encouraging — one of the few days of light in a dark world!

My dear Brother Ed.

The CBS radio show, "Birthday Tribute to Sir Winston Churchill", on November 29, 1954, was narrated and presented by your good self. This was one of the finest pieces of radio research and presentation on Sir Winston that I can remember. For various reasons, it is difficult for us to obtain this material from either the C.O.I. or the BBC, although I understand that CBS obtained a good deal of the material originally from the BBC.

I wonder if you would be so kind as to give us your permission to use the Churchill voice portions and, possibly, part or all of your own commentary for our public service programmes. This would, of course, entail the loan, or gift of a tape or recording. I realize that this is asking a great deal but we are badly in need of good Churchill material and your programme is so good that I just couldn't resist asking this favour of you.

I hope your Anglo-American shooting week-end goes off well and that the bag is a big one!

Would you please express to Mr. Murrow our deepest thanks for sending over the Columbia Masterworks record of the Churchill programme ... and for giving us permission to use it for the BIS Radio Series. The research, writing and production done by Mr. Murrow and his staff add up to a superb piece of work. We shall consider it a privilege to be able to use it.

We will probably use the material in a 15 minute, a half hour, and a full hour version. Stations which carry the BIS programmes will be able to use which ever of the three time-lengths they wish. For the 15 minute version, of course much cutting will have to be done, and a new narrator's voice will have to be added. (in part)

I shall give you copies of the tapes we issue, as well as finished scripts. I shall also forward a "rough transcript" of the record within a few days.

Dear Ed,

On Tuesday night at the Academy of Music I shall be the proudest and most pleased of the sponsors.

Since three of our four children, plus a new daughter-in law, will also attend the program, I recently showed them some pictures taken at the I. S. S. Conference at Brno, Czechoslovakia, in 1932. The first thing they noticed was that you had a cigarette in your land. I had to confess to them that in those days I thought you were too rationalistic. I now realize, of course, that your thinking was more mature than mine so that you balanced idealism with realism before I did. Although my intellect is not comparable with yours, my sincere and active interest in politics and world affairs has been sustained consistently throughout these many years. (Besides, I did have the good sense to vote for you for President of NSFA.)

Please don't bother to acknowledge this. After all, it is just another fan letter.

NC Will consider it next year

Dear Mr. Murrow:

The enclosed, from the Montreal Star, may have escaped your notice. We will all be watching and waiting for your future plans.

This is a strange and frightening world. Chaos is our name?

Has it occurred to you that everyone is willing to talk about the possible extinction of mankind, or the possible extinction of human freedom, but leaders who command a press audience back away from discussion of the immense benefits that would accrue to freedom and the West through federation for NATO? Even from exploration of the idea? Every orchid on the breasts of all the D. A. R.'s shouts the sanctity of national sovereignty . And yet look at the mangled sovereignty of Canada in the NORAD defense setup, etc. We lose sleep over insufficient defense mechanisms on the one side, and about runaway inflation on the other; but who will consider for a moment the relief that may be possible financially and economically by pooling the defense needs and plans of the fifteen pulling-and-hauling sovereignties under the cloak of a "unified" NATO?

May I suggest a filmed talk featuring Nobel Prize Winner Lester Pearson who knows a lot about NORAD and the UN and NATO--and about the pigeon-holing of Article II of the North Atlantic Treaty which Canada originated and still, sadly, asks to have implemented. You might ask a leading D.A.R. to participate--in fairness, or for comic relief. If something isn't done soon, through worship of the sacred cow of national sovereignty human freedom may die.

Please consider this seriously. Right now, when the Kremlin is playing with us at Geneva, under the false colors of the term "a free Berlin," something big should be done for individual freedom and the crying need for the tightest possible unity of those who value it.

Sincerely,
Mrs. Chase S. Osborn

Television and Radio

Murrow Triumphs With Montgomery

By PAT PEARCE

Ed Murrow is a man with a comfortable, if rare, conviction that the TV audience has a brain in its head, and occasionally likes to use it.

He's also a man of principle, apt to dig in his heels stubbornly over what might seem unimportant details, like commercials, but which to him are the first breach in the dam of editorial integrity.

The combination has not necessarily enhanced his popularity with all his associates, but has provided the TV audience with some of its more memorable viewing. We will miss him sorely next year.

This week Murrow presented the second in what is presumably a series of filmed talks with key contemporary figures. His first was with Truman, and a masterpiece in any terms. This week's was with Field Marshal Viscount Montgomery, always a controversial figure and the more so in the U.S. since publication of his provocative war history.

Talking with a controversial figure is a lot more rewarding than ambling along with a safe one. And even if Monty occassionally seemed to be talking through his hat, it was enormously refreshing to find a public figure going full speed ahead, and damn the torpedoes.

Monty went, too, lashing into the Battle of the Bulge, military chiefs taking to politics, the operation of NATO, sick men governing countries and anything else that came to mind. This isn't the place to comment on his views, except to say that whatever he said he said with great vigor, commendable simplicity and that combination of historical acumen and schoolboy relish we associate with that other British TV general, Brian Horrocks.

Viewers could get wry amusement, too, from co-interviewer Charles Collingwood. Unlike Murrow who remains endlessly unperturbed, Collingwood sat obviously, and painfully, tamping down a chauvinistic explosion, contenting himself with nailing Monty to the wall with one thin-lipped, penetrating question. This was, indeed, a striking demonstration of how to conduct an interview — not an inquisition —nor a discussion but a shrewd prodding to self-revelation.

Which is another good reason why we'll miss Murrow. He has the happy knack of stimulating viewers, then letting them figure out their own answers, and form their own opinions.

Latest word on Ed Sullivan's Moscow jaunt is August 3 to 24, when he will take a troupe of performers to the Moscow Trades Fair. A 90-minute show taped in Moscow, and another in Italy, are among Ed's plans for fall showing.

CBM goes all out for jazz Saturday, with a salute to Duke Ellington slated for 11 a.m. to noon; a salute to Benny Goodman filling in for blacked-out baseball 1.30 p.m. to 3. The Duke is 60 this week. Time does fly to be sure.

A promised treat on "Folio" next week: Emlyn Williams reading from the stories of Dylan Thomas. At least Welsh ex-patriates won't be able to complain about false or lost lilt of their singing speech.

Goodbyes have been well handled on TV of late—"Your Hit Parade" paying a cosy and chummy tribute to its TV crew; Arthur Godfrey saying a pleasant, forthright farewell and thanks on his last show before entering hospital.

James Whitmore gets a double exposure tonight on Ch. 3, starring in "Zane Grey Theatre" at 9, in "Playhouse 90 at 9.30.

Just a reminder, Ed Murrow's symposium on higher education for women will be heard on WCAX radio at 9.05 tonight; a special on the Salvation Army on CFCF's "Assignment" at 8.30.

P.S. that blackout in "Ah Wilderness's" famous facts-of-life scene Tuesday wasn't CBC censorship—just a wrong button pushed by NBC supervisory Personnel busy coping with a technicians' strike over foreign-made video tape.

TODAY we of the Western world have shown, in NATO and in other ways, our belief in collective defense for the pr servation of peace. As a consequence, we have accepted in principle, though only partially in practice, that national sovereignty must now be limited by the requirements of interdependence.

Indeed we in the free world are becoming more and more intertwined, more and more tied to each other. It is not surprising that at timew the ties chafe as well as bind. Nor is it surprising also, that, in the process of adapting ourselves to this essential and inevitable mixing process, our thinking should at times and on occasions become somewhat muddled. Much of our difficulty is due to the fact that the old political concept of absolute sovereignty and the old military concept of war as a matter of bullets and battalions tend to linger on and to confuse us in a nuclear age which has made these ideas as out-of-date as the Macedonian phalanx.

What, then, is the best way in present conditions to ensure our security --indeed our survival--by collective defense? Security has not in the past and cannot in the future be guaranteed by arms alone; lasting peace can be gained only through international friendship and understanding.

There are two principles that must govern the search for the answer to the strictly military question. First, defense must be genuinely collective, for national action alone will not be adequate. Second, only the United States has now the resources to give the power and leadership that is essential for such collective defense. This leadership, however, must be based on partnership, on the common participation of allies in risks and decisions. Indeed on no other basis can an association of free, democratic states be maintained. Partnership means cooperation. But that cooperation in defense will be prejudiced and perhaps destroyed by conflict in economic policies. . . .

DEFENCE against Tomorrow

THE Government's decision to abandon the Avro Arrow has been described as Canada's recognition that we are now in the missile age. The threats which the CF-105 was designed to combat have been superseded by massive developments in Soviet missile technology.

What do these developments mean? Now that the Arrow is dead, what new contribution can Canada make to the defence of the West?

These are just some of the questions asked by four of Canada's top reporters as they prepare Defence against Tomorrow — a one-hour CBC television documentary on the implications of the missile age for Canada's defence policies, to be presented starting at 3.00 p.m. EST on Sunday, March 22nd.

The obsolescence of military equipment such as the Arrow is only one of the many problems which Canada faces in the search for defences today to combat the weapons of tomorrow. Is Canada being forced to play a military role in the missile age in which our national sovereignty and independence is threatened; a role beyond our economic capacity, a role alien to our political and moral principles as a nation?

To examine the broader issues behind the Arrow decision, Charles Lynch, Blair Fraser, James M. Minifie, and Stanley Burke have been questioning some of the top military and political thinkers in the United States and Canada. Their opinions, in specially filmed interviews, form the basis of this enquiry into Canada's next big decision in defence — if not the Arrow, then what?

Defence against Tomorrow begins in Washington where CBC correspondent James M. Minifie examines where we stand now in our defence preparedness. The U.S. deputy secretary of defence, Donald A. Quarles, explains Canada's integration with the United States in the defence of North America through NORAD. Film released from the Pentagon shows U.S. missile development and the striking power of the Strategic Air Command — the threat of massive nuclear retaliation on which our strategy of deterrence is based. Other Washington interviews involve members of the Senate Armed Services, Preparedness and Foreign Relations committees. Canadian film from the Department of National Defence shows Canada's present contribution to Western defence.

From this view of present Western defence in Washington, the program moves to New York for an assessment of the threats of tomorrow. CBC correspondent Stanley Burke asks the question, "Have we armed for the wrong kind of war?" Several leading authorities on Soviet strategy challenge the present assumptions of defence planners. They suggest that we are not prepared to meet the real threats posed by the Soviets. Soviet ground forces and submarines, the dangers of brush-fire war and non-military aggression are some of these threats.

THE DANGER IS SO GREAT

JOHN FOSTER DULLES (NYTimes 11-6-57): It's obvious that the easiest way, in theory at least, to have (military) unity is through a politicalcombination. That was the conclusion to which we came here in the early days when, after an experiment with the Confederation, an alliance between the thirteen States, we decided it didn't work and therefore there was created the United States of America as a Federal political body in order, as the Preamble of the Constitution says, to provide for the common defense. . / . The question really comes down to whether nations are willing voluntarily to accept a measure of control over their forces by persons of another nationality in time of peace. They do it in time of war. They can do it in time of peace. The only question is whether they think that the danger is so great that they need to make what is not regarded as a normal peace-time sacrifice.

Now, I think that we do face a situation where the danger is so great, where the consequences of not combining are so serious both in terms of military effectiveness and in terms of the cost of sustaining a military establishment, that there will be increasing acceptance of that point of view. It is quite possible.

INCREASING ACCEPTANCE

LYNDON B. JOHNSON (NYTimes 11-6-57): Timid minds will not produce bold programs.... The Russians handed us both a technological defeat and a propaganda defeat. The times call for bold leadership by strong men and a feeble denial of the facts of life will not strengthen us.

PRIME MINISTER MACMILLAN (NYTimes 11-6-57): I say without hesitation, and without excuse, that this is a real turning point in history. (He appealed to the nations of the West to make further surrenders of sovereignty and to coordinate their political and military capacities.)

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR (Neal Stanford 11-5-57): The need for a rallying of the NATO countries, for a revival of free-world unity, is so great in the light of Moscow's missile successes that President Eis enhower, Prime Minister Harold Macmillan, and their colleagues have no choice but to start down that path of interdependence--whose end they may not yet clearly see or understand.

GENERAL GRUENTHER (Washington Star 2-7-58): Military supremacy alone, even if this country attains it, will not bring security. The economic and political-psychological fields are even more important in this country's struggle with the Soviet Union. "Whether we like it or not, our security and that of our partners are inextricably interwoven." It is imperative that we solve the problem of closer economic and political ties with other free countries.

C. L. SULZBERGER (NYTimes 4-14-58): Milit ary experts believe the alliance cannot indefinitely survive as a loose military confederation. It must give more authority... over all vital means of defense... The terrible system upon which the West relies for its existence must work pe rfectly the first time it is used--if it is ever used at all. ... This problem...is very much in allied minds...general s...civilian bosses...various governments. ... Inevitably public opinion must ponder its intricacies.

PAUL-HENRI SPAAK (Boston Herald 9-27-58): ...last night called on the United States and the Unit ed Kingdom to join in a firme r union of all the forces of the Western nations; ... warned the Ame rican people "your youthful strength may yet blind you to the truth, but it will sooner or later be brought home to all. I only hope that it will not be too late."

CANADA'S EFFORT TO OBTAIN IMPLEMENTATION OF NATO'S ARTICLE 2

Canada Proposed Article II of the North Atlantic Pact: "The Parties will contribute toward the further development of peaceful and friendly international relations by strengthening their free institutions, by bringing about a better understanding of the principles upon which these institutions are founded, and by promoting conditions of stability and well-being. They will seek to eliminate conflict in their international economic policies and will encourage economic collaboration between any or all of them." April, 1949

Canada Took First Official Action: by passing Senate Resolution advocating Atlantic Exploratory Convention, June 29, 1950. The Canadian Senate, four days after aggression came in Korea, passed a Resolution favoring Canada's participation in an Atlantic Exploratory Convention if one should be called. Senator W. D. Euler, introducing this, said, "This motion concerns itself with the most important issue in the world. ...Alliances never prevent wars. ...The nations that believe in freedom must unite in order to survive."

Canada established the first NATO Parliamentary Association, without about 100 members of the Canadian Federal Parliament.

Canada led, by means of the Canadian NATO Parliamentary Association, in the creation of the NATO Parliamentary Conference; which, at its third annual meeting in Paris in November 1957, recommended the Atlantic Congress (London, June 5-9, 1959) and also an Atlantic exploratory conference.

The first official and authoritative proposal to explore the possibilities of establishing a measure of common government among the nations of the North Atlantic area was made in February 1954 at Bonn by former Prime Minister St. Laurent of Canada: "It has become increasingly clear I think to all members of NATO and to those many countries who are associated with us throughout the free world that our very survival and our continued development in freedom and in peace depends upon our ability to look beyond national barriers and to make them somewhat less artificial and more satisfactory...Many of us believe the people living about the great basin of the Atlantic Ocean might well seek the solution to their problems of economic betterment, political stability and self-defense in this closer integration of their national resources and of their machinery of government."

Former Secretary of State for External Affairs Lester Pearson as early as 1950 was discussing the possibility of "an economic and political commonwealth of the western world: In this jet-propelled atomic age, no plan less than this will be adequate, no vision less than this will do." In November, 1958, at Boston, he told the Atlantic Assembly that the time had come for the strengthening of NATO into a supra-national organization where a common foreign policy could be debated for the entire Atlantic community, and expressed the sentiments of the European delegates that the leadership must come from the United States. He urged boldness and speed.

Prime Minister John Diefenbaker was vice-president of the Canadian NATO Parliamentary Association and a signer of the Declaration of Atlantic Unity, which suggests support of the calling of a conference of leading NATO citizens to explore all means of obtaining closer Atlantic unity.

The late Canadian Secretary of State for External Affairs, Dr. Sidney Smith was a signer of the Declaration of Atlantic Unity and favored exploration of the possibility of Atlantic federation.

Former Canadian Ambassador to NATO, L. D. Wilgress: "I am not surprised to learn (after reading Mr. Spaak's "The West in Disarray" in January 1957 'Foreign Affairs') that some time ago he endorsed the proposal for an Atlantic Exploratory Convention as a hopeful means of moving forward. . . "This proposal ...I am sure will have the sympathy of all those who have the welfare and future of NATO at heart."

Canadian Senator Wishart McL. Robertson (former Speaker, first president of the NATO Parliamentary Conference, founder of the Canadian NATO Parliamentary Association, vice-president of International Movement for Atlantic Union) (Montreal Star 4-30-59) said it was "tragic" that article two of NATO...had not been implemented...Russia had declared economic war. Western defence was something like France's ill-fated Maginot Line.

Canada, U.S. 'Drift' To Economic Union

Montreal Star 4-30-59

Wrong headline!

Canadian Press

OTTAWA, April 30—Canada appears to be drifting toward economic union with the United States, Senator Wishart Robertson said yesterday.

The alternative was economic co-operation with all NATO countries.

Economic union among countries seems to be the "order of the day," the Liberal Senator from Nova Scotia said in a Senate speech, deploring the lack of action to make use of NATO as an economic alliance as well as a military one.

It was "tragic" that article two of NATO — written in at Canada's insistence and containing the framework for Atlantic community economic co-operation — had not been implemented.

Blow to Canada

Senator Robertson, prominent in NATO parliamentary associations, said competition from the six-country European Common Market is going to hit Canada and the U.S. hard. It appeared there was no market where Canada would enjoy an advantage in a year or two — and this included the Commonwealth.

He doubted the United Kingdom could remain outside such economic groupings for long. What chance did Canada have with her smaller population?

"I'd say we're drifting—not rapidly—toward economic union with the U.S." That course would mean an economic curtain "right down the middle of the Atlantic."

He said the weight of defence spending in both North American countries is a chief contributor to inflation.

Meanwhile, Russia had declared economic war. Western defence was something like France's ill-fated Maginot Line. If Russia outflanked that defence by economic means, the West would be in a precarious position to retaliate.

Both Canada and the U.S. had "grossly aggravated" wage scales that made them vulnerable to competition from the European Common Market and other possible economic alliances.

Budget Director Fears Taxes Will Rise

The Administration's chief budget officer said today higher taxes will be needed to avoid inflation and balance the budget if "we can't get government spending under control."

Budget Director Maurice H. Stans called on Congress and the public to hold the line on Federal spending. This posture, he said, would prevent "inflationary deficits" not only in the 1960 fiscal year but in succeeding years.

'MOMENTUM'

Mr. Stans made the appeal to 3000 delegates attending the 47th annual meeting of the U. S. Chamber of Commerce. He said congressional appropriations this year would affect not only the $77 billion balanced budget President Eisenhower has proposed for fiscal 1960 but also Government finances in subsequent years.

"There is enough built in momentum in laws already enacted and programs budgeted to raise total expenditures in 1961 by two or three billion dollars" even if Congress does not exceed the President's recommendations for 1960, he said.

"The trend of rising spending on civilian programs will accelerate unless we take firm steps to bring it into check," Mr. Stans said. "Right now there are bills in Congress that, if enacted, would add $30 billion a year to spending and reduce revenues by $10 billion.

$7100-$2970

He foresaw rising outlays for interest on the national debt, farm supports, water resources, education, space projects and aviation.

Merryle Stanley Rukeyser, financial writer and commentator for Hearst Newspapers, told the delegates a family of four would need a money income of $7100 today in order to have buying power equal to $2970 of income 20 years ago.

He said "current witch hunts" were trying "to pin the blame for inflation on prices arbitrarily administered by industry." (UPI)

Brundage Sees Way to Save $10 Billion

Anderson's Mail

A great deal of mail has come to Treasury Secretary Anderson in response to his stout fight to balance the federal budget and halt inflation.

Two of these letters tell the inflation story eloquently.

"I will have to retire in a couple of years," wrote a man from St. Louis. "I tried to be patriotic and bought Liberty Bonds to be spent in my old age. I still have them and I purchased them with dollars worth a dollar. Today, 47 cents. I have been informed that the next four years it will be only 25 cents . . ."

And from New York: "As a young man I was employed in the Hamburg, Germany, office of a large American export house. I witnessed the disastrous inflation in Germany in 1923-24 and never have forgotten it."

He enclosed a five-million mark note with the comment that, in those days this sum, once representing a large fortune, was enough to buy one glass of beer. Shortly thereafter it wouldn't buy anything.

The St. Louis letter deals with inflation in its relatively early stages—with its 50 per cent tax on savings.

The New York letter hints what we have to look forward to, if monetary inflation is permitted to run its course.

The demagogues who argue a little more inflation won't hurt are asking us to risk the same kind of financial disaster which overtook the Germans.

Atlantic Union Can Save $10 Billion On Our Defense Bill, Says Brundage

By Louis Fischer (Scripps-Howard)

WASHINGTON — U. S. expenditures for defense could be pared by as much as $10 billion within two or three years after this nation joined in a federal union with other free Western democracies.

That is the opinion of a man who knows the U. S. financial picture from inside the government — former U. S. Budget Director Percival Brundage.

Mr. Brundage, partner in the big accounting firm of Price & Waterhouse and former president of the American Institute of Accountants, spoke at a one-day meeting of the board of governors of the Atlantic Union Committee here.

Mr. Brundage called the balanced budget of "paramount importance" and noted that the "greatest obstacle to keeping it in balance is the necessity for spending well over half of our tax receipts in defense."

"Fantastic" and rising defense costs are now taking a $40 billion annual bite out of tax revenues as we vie with the Russians for military superiority, he noted.

'Only Solution'

Said Mr. Brundage: "A federal union of the NATO countries is about the only solution I can see that would allow us to balance the budget with the expected defense cost increases, unless there's some break in Soviet policy.

"Once we united our common defense forces, we would immediately gain.

"1. A single, master plan for the most effective defense of our countries, instead of a dozen plans.

"2. The most efficient use of the production facilities of each country for the common needs.

"3. Uniform standards for equipment, ammunitions, planes and missiles, which would effect great savings.

"4. Similar training programs for all the forces.

"5. Reduction of rivalries between the services and a minimizing of national differences.

"6. More efficient weapons research and development.

"7. Common bases which would allow the elimination of considerable duplication and simplified strategic planning.

"8. More effective allocation of equipment and placement of weapons where they are needed.

"9. Elimination of doubt about our being able to retain our forward bases.

"10. Coordination of our radar defenses, which would simplify the problem of advance warning of attack and make our 24-hour alert more effective.

PERCIVAL BRUNDAGE

Could Reduce Spending

"Within two or three years we could reduce our own expenses for defense by as much as $10 billion and have greater protection than we do today.

"When united we would be strong enough to open up our trade with the Communist nations and remove the restrictions we've thought it necessary to impose.

This, Mr. Brundage said, would produce a "greater likelihood of cracks in the Iron Curtain."

About U. S. income taxes he said: "I believe they are too high but I see no hope for their being reduced unless there is an Atlantic Union.

He said he "strongly supports" the bill now pending before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee calling for a convention of citizens from the NATO countries to explore exhaustively ways in which the countries could effect economic unity, particularly in economic and political affairs.

The Sponsors

This is the resolution cosponsored by Sens. Kefauver (Dem., Tenn.), John Sherman Cooper (Rep., Ky.), Hubert Humphrey (Dem., Minn.) and Clifford Case (Rep., N. J.).

An Atlantic Union, Mr. Brundage predicted, would spark an "economic boom" in the U. S. which is facing increasing economic competition from abroad, especially from the European common market.

Mr. Brundage served in the Eisenhower administration from April 2, 1956 to March 17, 1957, first as deputy director and then director of the Budget Bureau.

THE ECONOMICS OF DEFENSE

(An address by former U.S. Budget Director, Hon. Percival F. Brundage, delivered at a luncheon sponsored by the Atlantic Union Committee at the Sheraton Park Hotel, Washington, D. C., April 28, 1959)

Since World War II, our nation's foreign policy and its economic and military assistance programs to the free world, have been far ahead of our isolationist policies after World War I. We have been going definitely in the right direction but not nearly fast enough. We have long needed to adopt something like the proposals of Clarence Streit for an Atlantic Union, and a constitutional convention is a logical start.

There are a good many reasons for our proceeding with "union now." The psychological effect throughout the free world and also behind the Iron Curtain is very important, but its effects on our economy would be equally significant. I have been asked to outline my reasons for favoring an Atlantic Union that are budgetary in character.

First let me say that I believe in a balanced federal budget. It is just as important for a government to live within its income as for a family to do so. It may be necessary to depart temporarily from this objective when revenues fall off abruptly as they have in the current fiscal year, but the experience of history has shown the dangers of continuing to operate at a deficit. We are experiencing right now a serious difficulty in refinancing the maturing national debt and our foreign neighbors have been repatriating some of their gold balances. An unbalanced budget contributes materially to the inflationary factors, such as the wage-price spiral, expanded credit gadgets to augment installment selling. The effects of inflation are damaging to everyone in the long run, however pleasant the initial steps seem to certain segments of the economy. It is therefore of paramount importance to explore all possible ways of obtaining and maintaining a budget balance.

While I am deeply concerned by our agriculture problems, veterans benefits, interest requirements and many other budget difficulties, the greatest obstacle in the way of keeping our budget balanced is the necessity for spending today over half of our total federal tax receipts on defense. I have, therefore, given a lot of thought to ways of trying to reduce this burden without lessening our protection. We have embarked on a competitive armaments race without fully intending to do so or to measure the consequences. Competition in conventional armaments would be bad enough without the terrific cost of our research and development program, the procurement of jet planes, of missiles of various kinds and uses, and of nuclear weapons; and they become obsolete over night. I firmly believe that the Russians are just as concerned as we are with this problem and would like to find a way out if they could do so without losing face.

From a geographic point of view the Communists have a more central position than we, and their forces are united into only two large groups - the Russians and the Chinese - while we are divided in many respects. They have the efficiency of operating under dictatorships and can change the direction of their policies with great rapidity and safety. They can spotlight production needs, and put pressure anywhere it seems to be most needed. However, they have their difficulties too. They are very vulnerable from our bases situated around their borders and a dictator is always afraid of his life. Bullet-proof vests and concrete bunkers are no protection today.

Their transportation system also is very vulnerable. The National Bureau of Economic Research, Inc. has just completed a study of transportation in the Soviet Union which makes a comparison of the freight carried there with that in the United States. There is relatively little Soviet freight traffic moved by any other means than rail for any distance. For 1957, 1209 billion metric ton-kilometers were moved by rail out of a total of 1346 billion. Our own freight movements in that year were twice the Soviet total, but our movements by rail have fallen off since 1950, while all other forms have increased: truck, pipeline and waterways.

The Soviet leaders do not have to maintain a very large or efficient Secret Service to find out about our new discoveries and developments. They are freely described in newspapers and magazines and talked about in Congress - even testimony given in secret hearings is frequently released. They know very well that we could wipe out all their important production and transportation centers in spite of their defense protection. I am not too worried about an outbreak of an atomic war in the near future, but I am concerned about the maintenance of a stable economy during the next few years, if we proceed as we are now going.

What are the possible ways of reducing our defense expenditures?

1. We are, of course, exploring in every way and with great patience and by direct negotiations possible ways to end the testing of nuclear weapons and to limit their production so long as we can rely on some kind of adequate detection program. So far our progress has been slow indeed.

2. Secondly, we could undoubtedly achieve greater unity between our separate U.S. military services. An Act passed last year enables us to have a direct line of authority from the President through the Joint Chiefs of Staff to the Field Commanders, but we still have four different services in the United States (including the Marines) and a great deal remains to be done in improving and coordinating their programs and activities.

3. We can have closer military cooperation among the NATO forces. Here, also, many improvements have been made in the last few years - a single Commander-in-Chief has been appointed for each area and we have made some progress in agreement on the production and use of common weapons and ammunition among our separate forces. But there is much more that could and should be done.

4. We could adopt compulsory military training or universal service which I prefer. I have long believed that our young people at age 18 or when graduated from high school should give a year to their country - both boys and girls.

5. We can take action to show our firm belief in use of law rather than force. Repeal the Connally Amendment and make greater use of the World Court.

6. We can seek to strengthen our own economic position and that of our Allies by closer economic cooperation, freer trade, reduction of tariffs, elimination of escape clauses, and perhaps by trying to join in some way the European trade agreements.

7. We could have more effective planning within NATO and the foreign offices of the several countries in formulating and outlining similar foreign policies. We could certainly have much less partisanship in this area and less embarrassing statements made both by business leaders and within the Congress. Those of us who have travelled abroad during the last few years remember how the papers in every country will headline the attacks on each other's policy and the way disagreements between our countries are played up while little attention is given to the many points of agreement on common aims and principles.

But all of these proposals, even if taken together, would do relatively little to meet our principal budgetary problem. A Federal Union of the NATO countries is about the only solution that I can see that would enable us to balance our budget with the inevitable increase in cost of defense services that lies ahead, unless an unexpected break should occur in the whole Soviet attitude.

Furthermore, by such a Union we would secure greater safety and a psychological advantage that of itself might well bring about a radical change in Soviet policy.

I am not minimizing the difficulties to be encountered. Think of the troubles our Forefathers had. But we are going to find that our present difficulties will be multiplied in the years ahead if we fail to unite.

Once we united our common defense forces, we would immediately gain:

(1) A single master plan for the most effective defense of all of our countries instead of a dozen different plans;

(2) The most efficient use of the production facilities in each of the countries for our common needs, taking full advantage of location, labor supply and transportation problems;

(3) Uniform standards of equipment, ammunition, planes, missiles and other weapons (a great savings is possible here);

(4) Similar training programs for the forces;

(5) Reduction of rivalry between the services. Although there would still be national differences, they would have to be minimized and the pride in the different regional units would tend to cut across service lines. The substitution of a larger for a limited loyalty is often the best way to end local disputes;

(6) More efficient research and development; we are having great difficulty ourselves in consolidating the efforts of the different military services and civilian agencies. An Atlantic Union would really bring them to realization of the need for full interchange of information;

(7) Common bases would enable the elimination of considerable duplication and strategic planning would be greatly simplified. Think of the effect of including Australia, Singapore, Gibraltar, Malta;

(8) More effective allocation of present equipment and concentration of newer weapons and developments where they would be most needed;

(9) Elimination of doubt as to our being able to retain our forward bases would make it unnecessary to plan alternative bases as we are now doing. This would also remove part of the fears of our Spanish friends;

(10) Coordination of radar and other warning devices would simplify advance notice problems and make our 24-hour alert much more effective.

I have made a great many computations to arrive at the possible monetary savings from an Atlantic Union. I realize all too well that anticipated gains from mergers and improvements in operation are always offset in part by increasing costs and other obstacles such as the difficulty of reducing personnel and closing installations; I came to realize these during my government service. But here we had such a tremendous potential gain and I can see no commensurate opportunity in any other possible alternative.

All in all, I have come to the conclusion that within two or three years we could reduce our own expenditures for defense by as much as 10 billion dollars in addition to the savings of our Allies, and at the same time gain increased production.

Of course we should proceed as well with the other steps I have outlined, many of which would automatically be accomplished, and the others would become much easier to put through once we have decided to unite the nations of the free world.

When united we would be strong enough to open up our trade with the Communist nations and remove the restrictions we have thought it necessary to impose. I have always thought we were rather short sighted in helping to build up the "iron curtain" as we have certainly done. We have made it possible for them to exclude Western ideas and keep us from learning about their advances and also their mistakes. By a freer exchange of goods and services there would be inevitably a freer exchange of ideas and a much greater likelihood of cracks appearing in the Soviet monolith.

I'd like to make one last point before closing.

I believe that our income tax rates are too high but I can see little likelihood of our being able to balance the budget and reduce taxes during the period immediately ahead without a breakthrough such as that which would be achieved by an Atlantic Union.

I strongly support the Atlantic Exploratory Convention Resolution (S. Con. Res. 17), as I have its predecessor resolutions.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

As I read the enclosed article in our Kalamazoo College Alumni Bulletin, I thought of your interest in press reporting of governmental activities. It's just possible that this is a particular tid-bit of English history that has escaped you,--tho with your long stay in London and thorough familiarity with English history, that's rather doubtful.

At any rate it seemed worth while to invest a 4¢ stamp in it and send it along. I'll be glad if you find it of any interest. I was intrigued with the extent to which imagination was accepted as fact--tho I suppose we are not entirely free of this problem in the 20th Century either...

I've been enthusiastic about your programs such as the "Who Killed Michael Farmer" piece, and am looking forward to "The Business of Sex" next Monday. Keep it up!

You've probably long since forgotten about the lieutenant in special service on board the Queen Elizabeth in 1943, but I'm the guy.

I think your program I liked most of all was the round table with all the CBS overseas men at the end of the year. With the exception of Charles Collingwood, whom I met in your office in London, I had never seen the faces of these men, many of whom I had known as voices for years... It was quite an experience to see them at last.

Sincerely,

Curt Osborn

SPEAKING OF BOOKS

By Dr. Arnold Mulder

When the President of the United States holds a news conference and gives respectful attention to the questions of the reporters, few, even of those who take part, may remember that this state of affairs is the result of more than two centuries of the newspapers' battle for the right of the people to know. In our day the Supreme Court is almost the only institution in government that looks down its nose at the press; the executive and legislative departments provide every facility they can think of to make reporting easy for representatives of the papers.

As late as in the middle of the eighteenth century, not much more than 200 years ago, British statesmen regarded the newspapers as a nuisance, and Parliament held that the press had no rights whatsoever.

In a book called Johnson's England, a description of English institutions in the eighteenth century, I came across a curious attack on the press. Parliament, by formal resolution, declared that all reports should be excluded from the public sessions and that any paper that printed reports of the parliamentary debates should be severely punished.

In the quaint diction of the eighteenth century, Parliament decreed:

> "It is a high indignity to and a notorious breach of the privileges of this House, for any News-Writer, in Letters, or other Papers (as Minutes, or under any other denomination), or for any Printer or Publisher of any printed News-Paper of any denomination, to presume to insert in the said Letters or Papers, or to give therein any account of the Debates or other Proceedings, of this House, or any Committee thereof, as well during the recess, as the Sitting of Parliament; and that this House will proceed with utmost severity against such offenders."

In twentieth century English, any newspaper that published a report of what was said or done at any session of Parliament would be fined and its editor would be placed behind the bars or put in the pillory. Daniel Defoe, of Robinson Crusoe fame, an early editor, was in fact both placed in the pillory and put in prison.

The newspapers fought this early denial of the people's right to know from the very start. When reporters were not allowed in the gallery of Parliament as reporters, the papers hired writers with good memories to attend the sessions. They were not permitted to take notes, but they committed to memory the points made by the politicians in the debates. Then they would go to the office and write the speeches as best they could from memory.

Samuel Johnson, the great eighteenth century writer whose books today's college students read reverently as British classics, carried the process a step further. He did not even attend the Parliamentary sessions or listen to the speeches he reported. As a super-"ghost"-writer he was centuries ahead of those who write the speeches of the statesmen of today. In his book, The Achievement of Samuel Johnson, Professor Walter Jackson Bates describes Johnson's technique:

> "The proceedings of the Commons were not at this time recorded or allowed to be reported. Abridged accounts, however, were occasionally published when the House was in recess. In time, the Gentleman's Magazine began publishing what were assumed to be rather full reports. For two years (1741-43) Johnson was their sole author, with hardly any information given him except the subject of the debate, the names of the speakers, the order in which they appeared, and an indication of the arguments used. Yet these debates, 'the mere coinage of his own imagination,' were written with astonishing speed — three printed columns in an hour, according to John Nichols, and 'faster than most persons could have transcribed that quantity.' Many years later, the reports were still generally accepted as true."

Some of the major statesmen of Johnson's time live today in the history of British eloquence largely because a newspaper writer of genius attributed speeches to them that they were too unskilled to write themselves. In view of the growing sytem of "ghost" writing, some twentieth century statesmen are doubtless winning reputations in oral belles-lettres in a similar way.

DECLARATION OF ATLANTIC UNITY

Petition to the Atlantic Congress

We, the undersigned signers of the Declaration of Atlantic Unity, call upon the Atlantic Congress to endorse the following proposals designed to strengthen NATO and to unify the Atlantic Community:

Political Proposals

1. Endorsement of the unanimous resolution of the Third NATO Parliamentarians' Conference in 1957 that the NATO governments "bring about, in accordance with the constitutional and governmental processes of their countries, a conference composed of leading representative citizens selected on a non-partisan basis and directed to convene as often as necessary in order to examine exhaustively and to recommend how greater cooperation and unity of purpose, as envisioned by the North Atlantic Treaty, within the Atlantic Community may best be developed." (Unanimously approved by the U.S. Senate Foreign Relations Committee in 1958.)

2. Meetings of the Heads of the NATO Governments, similar to the one held in December, 1957, should take place annually.

3. The Permanent Representatives on the North Atlantic Council should be given higher status equivalent to that of Cabinet Ministers.

4. To carry out its accepted principle of inter-dependence, the North Atlantic Council should, on certain questions, reach decisions by less than a unanimous vote. Our governments should proceed immediately to negotiate an agreement as to what kind of questions are suitable for such decisions and the weight to be given to the vote of each member country.

5. The North Atlantic Council should appoint a small group of qualified men of wide experience, who would represent the Atlantic Community as a whole instead of their governments, to advise the Council on measures which might advance the common interests of the Atlantic Community.

6. The NATO governments should seek to coordinate their policies within the United Nations and other international agencies on all questions of common concern.

7. The North Atlantic Council should officially recognize the right of the NATO Parliamentarians' Conference to advise the Council on political, economic, cultural and social questions and to receive an annual report from the Secretary General.

Economic Proposals

1. The elaboration, pursuant to Article II of the North Atlantic Treaty, of a comprehensive mutual program for lowering tariffs, freeing currencies and eliminating trade restrictions so that there may be established an adequate economic basis for the Atlantic Community and associated nations.

2. The creation of more adequate machinery for economic cooperation such as an Atlantic Economic Council. An alternative means to this end could be the inclusion of the Organization for European Economic Cooperation (OEEC) in an Organization for Atlantic Economic Cooperation (OAEC) in which Canada and the United States would be full members.

3. An Atlantic Investment and Development Fund should be established to assist underdeveloped countries, either directly or through other international agencies.

Cultural Proposal

1. The financing and establishment of an Atlantic Institute which would serve as a research center and clearing house for the Atlantic peoples, promote a greater sense of community among them and discover and develop Atlantic leadership adequate to these tasks.

DECLARATION OF ATLANTIC UNITY

Explanatory Notes on Petition to the Atlantic Congress

Political Proposals

1. The Atlantic Congress, comprising 650 members and meeting for only five days, cannot "examine exhaustively" the possibilities of achieving greater unity. The Congress, however, could very effectively bring home to the Atlantic peoples the urgent need for such an examination.

The Conference proposed in this resolution, which would comprise less than 100 members and which would "convene as often as necessary" to complete its task, would be an appropriate and exceedingly valuable follow-up of the Congress. Its endorsement by the Congress might prove to be the most constructive accomplishment of the Congress.

2. The value of such a meeting of Heads of Governments has been evident from the impact of the first one in December 1957 and from the emphasis given it subsequently in NATO publications.

3. Whatever their status, the Permanent Representatives on the Council will still be subject to the instructions of their governments. But the higher their status is, the more scope will be given them in respect to decisions and the more influence their views will have upon their governments. For example, the U. S. Permanent Representative could be accorded the status and the position now possessed by Ambassador Lodge at the United Nations.

4. The principle of inter-dependence has been accepted by the Council, yet every member of the Council still possesses a veto. To implement this principle as regards decisions, it would seem necessary to provide that at least some questions can be decided by less than a unanimous vote.

It is obvious that only certain questions would now be regarded as suitable for any form of weighted majority vote, comparable to that provided for in the new European institutions. What these questions are, and how votes might be weighted, are problems which only governments can decide. Should such a system work successfully on certain types of questions, it seems likely that it would be extended to include other types of questions.

There is wide recognition that any attempt to revise the North Atlantic Treaty at this time would be unwise. Consequently, it is proposed that the member governments should proceed by negotiating an agreement, which could be supplementary to the Treaty.

5. The Permanent Representatives on the Council and all their assistants represent their governments. Today only the Secretary General and the International Staff represent the Atlantic Community as a whole.

This proposal would bring about the creation of a small group of outstanding men, whose function would be only advisory, to represent the interests of the Atlantic Community as a whole. Their advice on problems before the Council could point the way to policies and actions which would be beneficial to this Community and should make it more difficult for any government to block action which would promote the general interest.

6. "Coordinate" is used here because obviously "concerted" policies might in some cases evoke antagonism on the part of friendly governments which are outside NATO.

7. The fourth proposal in the Declaration advocated an advisory Atlantic Assembly. In recent years parliamentarians and others have suggested that the NATO Parliamentarians' Conference should be transformed into a formally constituted Consultative Assembly, comparable to the Consultative Assembly of the Council of Europe.

The Third NATO Parliamentarians' Conference resolved in 1957 that it should receive an annual report from the NATO Secretariat for discussion and that a link should be set up between its Standing Committee and the North Atlantic Council. This proposal is more specific in advocating such an official "link" and reiterates the request for an annual report. It could be implemented simply by a resolution of the Council.

Economic Proposals

1. This text is taken from point 2 of the Declaration itself.

2. The Report of the Three Wise Men of 1956 concludes that NATO is not an appropriate agency for administering development programs or even for concerting national economic policies. These tasks can more effectively be carried out in the Atlantic area by some specialized economic agency. This purpose might best be achieved by creation of a new agency, or, if that should not prove practicable, an existing agency should be adapted.

The principal economic agency in Western Europe, or in the entire Atlantic area, is OEEC, which includes Sweden, Switzerland, Austria and Eire as well as the European members of NATO. The United States and Canada have been associate members of OEEC since 1950. This organization has a Council as well as a highly qualified Secretariat and has during the last decade developed efficient teamwork.

At this time OEEC needs a wider field of activity. Since European and Atlantic economic cooperation involves so many interlocking problems, a practical way of providing adequate Atlantic machinery for economic cooperation appears to be the inclusion of OEEC in a larger framework as proposed. This would allow OEEC to continue to deal with European problems yet make its machinery and qualified personnel available for economic cooperation on an Atlantic basis.

3. This proposal has considerable support in NATO and OEEC circles. While uncommitted countries might be reluctant to seek aid from such a Fund if it were either a part of NATO or were representative primarily of "colonial" powers, such reluctance is less likely if the countries participating in the Fund include a large proportion of "non-colonial" nations. This would be the case if they comprised the members of an OAEC, in which the "non-colonial" majority would be about two-thirds.

One advantage of such a Fund would be to demonstrate to the uncommitted nations that the peoples of the Atlantic Community have a real and tangible interest in their welfare. This would be evident regardless of whether actual aid were furnished directly or indirectly.

As compared with United States assistance of the same type, such a Fund would have a further advantage. It could employ a large proportion of qualified European personnel instead of Americans, thereby diminishing the overhead costs of assistance and avoiding antagonisms which American personnel have created in some under-developed countries, due to inability to speak languages and disproportionately high living standards.

Cultural Proposal

1. An Atlantic Institute would do, for the entire Atlantic Community, what such bodies as the Royal Institute for International Affairs, the Council on Foreign Relations, and the Centre d'Etudes de Politique Etrangère do for their respective countries. Sub-committee A-3 of the Atlantic Congress will deal specifically with this question.

I do not sign petitions

April 6, 1959

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
485 Madison Avenue
New York, N.Y.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

I enclose a copy of a letter and attachments that I sent you on March 11.

While we do appreciate how busy you are we hope you will take a few minutes to read the enclosed petition and to fill out and mail the enclosed card.

We hope, of course, that you will allow us to add your name to the petition. The names of those Declaration signers who have already agreed to do so are checked on the back of this letterhead. Your name would, of course, add great weight to the petition.

But even if you do not agree to sign we hope you will return the enclosed card. In that case it would be very helpful to us if you listed on the card the numbers of the proposals which you cannot accept. We will keep this information confidential.

The situation we are seeking to improve is described as follows by NATO Secretary General Spaak in his article "New Tests for NATO" in Foreign Affairs for April, 1959.

"Common-sense solutions seem to be running head on into stubborn forces of nationalism and individualism within the Alliance. Despite what I should have thought was the dazzlingly clear lesson of history, the governments of the free peoples are not yet ready to seek security and salvation through integration...Here we are faced with the real weakness of the Atlantic Alliance in every sphere - the lack of unity. This is the problem which we are up against whether we are dealing with scientific research, armaments production, aid to underdeveloped countries, military organization or the conduct of diplomacy. We still jealously guard our individuality. I fully appreciate the very genuine values which this encompasses; yet I realize too what it is costing us in duplicated effort, both intellectual and financial, what it means in terms of wasted energy and how difficult it makes it for us to get results...

"This would imply, of course, the conviction that there exists today a real community of interest among the members of the Alliance which must be served with the same energy, love and pride that for centuries have been put at the service of each individual country."

May we look forward to hearing from you?

Yours very sincerely,

Lithgow Osborne

March 11, 1959

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
485 Madison Avenue
New York, N. Y.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

As promised in my letter to you of February 19, I enclose herewith a petition (with explanatory notes) addressed to the Atlantic Congress of 650 leading citizens and parliamentarians from NATO countries to be held in London in June of this year. The petition is the result of an initiative by the British Sponsors of the Declaration, and the final draft may be regarded as a joint British-American product.

This petition has been endorsed by the Sponsors of the Declaration in the United Kingdom, United States, France, Canada, Germany, Italy, Netherlands, Belgium, Norway, Iceland and Greece. (Our Danish and Turkish Sponsors have reservations on some of the political proposals. We have as yet no Sponsors in Portugal and Luxembourg.)

We are mailing the petition to all signers of the Declaration (listed on the reverse of this letterhead), and when the replies are in we shall try to get it, with attached signatures, into the hands of all delegates to the Atlantic Congress. We shall also try to arrange with the Atlantic Congress managers for a formal presentation of the petition at a plenary session of the Congress.

We believe the proposals in the petition are a logical implementation of the original Declaration that you signed in 1954, and we hope you will be willing to agree with it. Your distinguished public record as the leading commentator in this country would make your adherence especially significant and helpful.

Please be good enough to check and sign the enclosed card and mail it in the enclosed self-addressed, stamped envelope.

I feel sure that in general the petition accords with your views, but only the names of those who accept the petition as a whole will be included among the signatories, as to specify individual reservations might well prove too complicated.

With all best wishes for greater Atlantic Unity in these grave times, I am

Very sincerely yours,

Lithgow Osborne

DECLARATION OF ATLANTIC UNITY

Petition to the Atlantic Congress

We, the undersigned signers of the Declaration of Atlantic Unity, call upon the Atlantic Congress to endorse the following proposals designed to strengthen NATO and to unify the Atlantic Community:

Political Proposals

1. Endorsement of the unanimous resolution of the Third NATO Parliamentarians' Conference in 1957 that the NATO governments "bring about, in accordance with the constitutional and governmental processes of their countries, a conference composed of leading representative citizens selected on a non-partisan basis and directed to convene as often as necessary in order to examine exhaustively and to recommend how greater cooperation and unity of purpose, as envisioned by the North Atlantic Treaty, within the Atlantic Community may best be developed." (Unanimously approved by the U.S. Senate Foreign Relations Committee in 1958.)

2. Meetings of the Heads of the NATO Governments, similar to the one held in December, 1957, should take place annually.

3. The Permanent Representatives on the North Atlantic Council should be given higher status equivalent to that of Cabinet Ministers.

4. To carry out its accepted principle of inter-dependence, the North Atlantic Council should, on certain questions, reach decisions by less than a unanimous vote. Our governments should proceed immediately to negotiate an agreement as to what kind of questions are suitable for such decisions and the weight to be given to the vote of each member country.

5. The North Atlantic Council should appoint a small group of qualified men of wide experience, who would represent the Atlantic Community as a whole instead of their governments, to advise the Council on measures which might advance the common interests of the Atlantic Community.

6. The NATO governments should seek to coordinate their policies within the United Nations and other international agencies on all questions of common concern.

7. The North Atlantic Council should officially recognize the right of the NATO Parliamentarians' Conference to advise the Council on political, economic, cultural and social questions and to receive an annual report from the Secretary General.

Economic Proposals

1. The elaboration, pursuant to Article II of the North Atlantic Treaty, of a comprehensive mutual program for lowering tariffs, freeing currencies and eliminating trade restrictions so that there may be established an adequate economic basis for the Atlantic Community and associated nations.

2. The creation of more adequate machinery for economic cooperation such as an Atlantic Economic Council. An alternative means to this end could be the inclusion of the Organization for European Economic Cooperation (OEEC) in an Organization for Atlantic Economic Cooperation (OAEC) in which Canada and the United States would be full members.

3. An Atlantic Investment and Development Fund should be established to assist underdeveloped countries, either directly or through other international agencies.

Cultural Proposal

1. The financing and establishment of an Atlantic Institute which would serve as a research center and clearing house for the Atlantic peoples, promote a greater sense of community among them and discover and develop Atlantic leadership adequate to these tasks.

DECLARATION OF ATLANTIC UNITY

Explanatory Notes on Petition to the Atlantic Congress

Political Proposals

1. The Atlantic Congress, comprising 650 members and meeting for only five days, cannot "examine exhaustively" the possibilities of achieving greater unity. The Congress, however, could very effectively bring home to the Atlantic peoples the urgent need for such an examination.

The Conference proposed in this resolution, which would comprise less than 100 members and which would "convene as often as necessary" to complete its task, would be an appropriate and exceedingly valuable follow-up of the Congress. Its endorsement by the Congress might prove to be the most constructive accomplishment of the Congress.

2. The value of such a meeting of Heads of Governments has been evident from the impact of the first one in December 1957 and from the emphasis given it subsequently in NATO publications.

3. Whatever their status, the Permanent Representatives on the Council will still be subject to the instructions of their governments. But the higher their status is, the more scope will be given them in respect to decisions and the more influence their views will have upon their governments. For example, the U. S. Permanent Representative could be accorded the status and the position now possessed by Ambassador Lodge at the United Nations.

4. The principle of inter-dependence has been accepted by the Council, yet every member of the Council still possesses a veto. To implement this principle as regards decisions, it would seem necessary to provide that at least some questions can be decided by less than a unanimous vote.

It is obvious that only certain questions would now be regarded as suitable for any form of weighted majority vote, comparable to that provided for in the new European institutions. What these questions are, and how votes might be weighted, are problems which only governments can decide. Should such a system work successfully on certain types of questions, it seems likely that it would be extended to include other types of questions.

There is wide recognition that any attempt to revise the North Atlantic Treaty at this time would be unwise. Consequently, it is proposed that the member governments should proceed by negotiating an agreement, which could be supplementary to the Treaty.

5. The Permanent Representatives on the Council and all their assistants represent their governments. Today only the Secretary General and the International Staff represent the Atlantic Community as a whole.

This proposal would bring about the creation of a small group of outstanding men, whose function would be only advisory, to represent the interests of the Atlantic Community as a whole. Their advice on problems before the Council could point the way to policies and actions which would be beneficial to this Community and should make it more difficult for any government to block action which would promote the general interest.

6. "Coordinate" is used here because obviously "concerted" policies might in some cases evoke antagonism on the part of friendly governments which are outside NATO.

7. The fourth proposal in the Declaration advocated an advisory Atlantic Assembly. In recent years parliamentarians and others have suggested that the NATO Parliamentarians' Conference should be transformed into a formally constituted Consultative Assembly, comparable to the Consultative Assembly of the Council of Europe.

The Third NATO Parliamentarians' Conference resolved in 1957 that it should receive an annual report from the NATO Secretariat for discussion and that a link should be set up between its Standing Committee and the North Atlantic Council. This proposal is more specific in advocating such an official "link" and reiterates the request for an annual report. It could be implemented simply by a resolution of the Council.

Economic Proposals

1. This text is taken from point 2 of the Declaration itself.

2. The Report of the Three Wise Men of 1956 concludes that NATO is not an appropriate agency for administering development programs or even for concerting national economic policies. These tasks can more effectively be carried out in the Atlantic area by some specialized economic agency. This purpose might best be achieved by creation of a new agency, or, if that should not prove practicable, an existing agency should be adapted.

The principal economic agency in Western Europe, or in the entire Atlantic area, is OEEC, which includes Sweden, Switzerland, Austria and Eire as well as the European members of NATO. The United States and Canada have been associate members of OEEC since 1950. This organization has a Council as well as a highly qualified Secretariat and has during the last decade developed efficient teamwork.

At this time OEEC needs a wider field of activity. Since European and Atlantic economic cooperation involves so many interlocking problems, a practical way of providing adequate Atlantic machinery for economic cooperation appears to be the inclusion of OEEC in a larger framework as proposed. This would allow OEEC to continue to deal with European problems yet make its machinery and qualified personnel available for economic cooperation on an Atlantic basis.

3. This proposal has considerable support in NATO and OEEC circles. While uncommitted countries might be reluctant to seek aid from such a Fund if it were either a part of NATO or were representative primarily of "colonial" powers, such reluctance is less likely if the countries participating in the Fund include a large proportion of "non-colonial" nations. This would be the case if they comprised the members of an OAEC, in which the "non-colonial" majority would be about two-thirds.

One advantage of such a Fund would be to demonstrate to the uncommitted nations that the peoples of the Atlantic Community have a real and tangible interest in their welfare. This would be evident regardless of whether actual aid were furnished directly or indirectly.

As compared with United States assistance of the same type, such a Fund would have a further advantage. It could employ a large proportion of qualified European personnel instead of Americans, thereby diminishing the overhead costs of assistance and avoiding antagonisms which American personnel have created in some under-developed countries, due to inability to speak languages and disproportionately high living standards.

Cultural Proposal

1. An Atlantic Institute would do, for the entire Atlantic Community, what such bodies as the Royal Institute for International Affairs, the Council on Foreign Relations, and the Centre d'Etudes de Politique Etrangère do for their respective countries. Sub-committee A-3 of the Atlantic Congress will deal specifically with this question.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

As a signer of the Declaration of Atlantic Unity I think you will be interested in the enclosed summary of what we have done in the past and what we hope to do in 1959.

I believe your experience in international affairs will indicate that nothing worthwhile "just happens" - somebody has to make it happen. We think the record will show that over the past five years the Declaration and its signers have played a key (and in some cases a decisive) part in such important advances as the formation and strengthening of the NATO Parliamentary Conference, the appointment of the Committee of Three Wise Men and the acceptance of their report, the decision to hold a NATO Summit Conference in 1957 and the decision to have an Atlantic Congress in 1959. That is why Chris Herter and others in government have spoken so highly of our activities.

The proposed Atlantic Congress, to be opened by Queen Elizabeth on June 5 in London and attended by 650 delegates from the NATO countries, offers a particularly favorable opportunity to carry on our endeavors. Many of the delegates to the Congress from all countries will be signers of the Declaration, and we are hoping that they will work together in London to have the Congress (the first such meeting ever to be held in history) promote objectives of the Declaration which are still unimplemented or not yet adopted by our governments.

I don't think it is any exaggeration to say that the Declaration Sponsors and signers are the only international group which is actively engaged in assisting the NATO governments to build NATO into what President Eisenhower, Secretary Dulles and others have called for, i.e. "to develop NATO into the totality of its meaning" and bring about "that unity of free nations that is our only hope of survival".

Early in March we hope to send for your approval a set of proposals to the Atlantic Congress endorsed by the Sponsors of the Declaration in fourteen NATO countries.

DECLARATION OF ATLANTIC UNITY

PROGRAM FOR 1959

Atlantic Congress

1. Assist in every way possible preparations for the Atlantic Congress of 650 leading citizens from all NATO countries to be held in London in June 1959.

2. In cooperation with the Sponsors in all NATO countries prepare brief and specific proposals to be submitted to the Congress in behalf of those signers of the Declaration who assent to them.

3. Seek to secure the implementation of these proposals (and other proposals by the Congress along Declaration lines) by NATO governments and/or the NATO Parliamentary Conference and private groups.

Atlantic Institute

4. Work with other groups in the Atlantic field for the financing and establishment of an Atlantic Institute which would serve as a research center and clearing house for the Atlantic peoples, promote a sense of community among them and discover and develop Atlantic leadership adequate to these tasks.

NATO Council

5. Continue to urge the raising by all governments of the status and powers of their Ambassadors to NATO (Permanent Representatives) as suggested by President Eisenhower and others.

6. Continue to work for the implementation by all NATO governments of the 1956 Committee of Three Report to the North Atlantic Council.

Inter NATO Disputes

7. Use the Declaration machinery of informal personal contacts to the end of securing an agreed settlement of disputes between NATO countries.

Rounding Out NATO

8. Use our influence with NATO governments to meet the Soviet economic offensive by a comprehensive mutual program of economic cooperation as envisaged in Article II of the North Atlantic Treaty.

9. Suggest to official and unofficial bodies means of strengthening NATO on the political, military, economic and cultural side.

10. Continue frequent correspondence and close personal contacts with Sponsors and signers of the Declaration in all NATO countries to promote these objectives.

DECLARATION OF ATLANTIC UNITY

SUMMARY FOR 1958

January - April. Director visited Ottawa once and Washington three times to confer with leading legislators and officials. The Declaration concentrated on getting support for S. Con. Res. 62 (endorsing the NATO Parliamentarians' call for an Atlantic Exploratory Conference) and to this end wrote or saw all U.S. signers - some of them several times. The Declaration was the only private group supporting this Resolution.

(On April 22 the Resolution was unanimously reported out by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. However, despite the best efforts of the Declaration, it was never brought to a vote before Congress adjourned.)

At the same time the Declaration worked to get the Atlantic Exploratory Conference proposal endorsed by the NATO Ministerial Council. Due to our efforts the Canadian Minister of External Affairs was pledged to bring it up at the May meeting of the Council and some other ministers were pledged to support it. Due to a misunderstanding (for which the Declaration was not responsible) this failed to eventuate.

May 5. Lithgow Osborne gave a dinner to Under Secretary of State Herter for an off-the-record discussion of Atlantic affairs. This dinner was attended by 45 leading citizens - many of them heads of large corporations. In the course of his remarks Mr. Herter had the following to say about the Declaration: "Along with 78 other Americans I signed the Declaration of Atlantic Unity in 1954 and I have always been glad I did so. It has been a very effective instrument from the point of view of our foreign policy. One of the reasons the Declaration of Atlantic Unity has been so successful is that it brought together intelligent and practical leaders from all NATO countries on a specific program. Of its five recommendations three have been actually put in practice and the other two are still highly desirable."

May 23 - 31. The Director flew to Zurich (via London and Paris) for a meeting of the Standing Committee of the Conference on Atlantic Community (Bruges Conference). This meeting published a Declaration and Program of Atlantic Activities including a recommendation for setting up an Atlantic Institute. (Director's expenses on this trip were paid by the Conference.)

July 7 - 14. Director flew to Paris to attend meeting of Advisory Council of the Atlantic Congress which made basic plans for the Congress in June 1959. (Director's expenses on this trip were paid by the NATO Parliamentary Conference.)

September 23. Director helped organize and attended the first meeting of the Board of the U.S. Committee for the Atlantic Congress. (Lithgow Osborne and William H. Draper, Jr. are also members of this Board.)

October - November. The Director visited the capitols of the following NATO countries - Iceland, Britain, Belgium, Netherlands, Denmark, Norway, Germany, France. During these visits he talked with the Sponsors and leading legislators and foreign office officials on Atlantic matters including the Icelandic fisheries dispute, an Atlantic Free Trade Area and the 1959 Atlantic Congress. In each country he also talked either with the U.S. Ambassador or Charge d'Affairs.

In Paris in November the Director attended the second meeting of the Atlantic Congress Advisory Council and the Fourth NATO Parliamentary Conference. At the latter he had talks with some 50 or 60 members from all 15 delegations and with members of the NATO staff and entertained (or was entertained by) some 20 of them at dinner or lunch. As at previous conferences the Director had an official observer's card entitling him to attend private as well as public sessions.

December 9. The third meeting of the Board of the U.S. Committee for the Atlantic Congress appointed the Director to have charge of U.S. preparations for the sub-committee on an Atlantic Institute and to establish liaison with the Canadian committee on the Atlantic Congress.

(In all these activities the counsel, cooperation and participation of the Declaration Sponsors in all countries were invaluable.)

DECLARATION OF ATLANTIC UNITY

Accomplishments May 1954 - December 1957

Summary

(NATO, governmental and legislative action in parentheses)

1954

May-Sept. Declaration drafted, sponsors and 244 signers secured in nine NATO countries.

Oct. 4. Text of Declaration and list of signers released to press.

Nov. 17. U.S. Sponsors gave dinner to leading legislators of nine NATO countries who agreed on plan to call a NATO Parliamentary Conference. The Declaration was the only private group that worked for the establishment of such a body.

Dec. 16. International delegation representing the signers presented the Declaration formally to NATO Council.

March Pamphlet published - 8,000 copies distributed. French Sponsors publish and distribute a French edition.

April-July Director visited Washington, Ottawa, London, Paris, Brussels, Bonn, The Hague, Copenhagen and Oslo to help insure delegations to the NATO Parliamentary Conference. He explained the idea to the press in a number of countries and to the Conference on the Western Community at Oslo.

July Director attended first NATO Parliamentary Conference in Paris. (All NATO members were represented by 200 legislators. Conference decided to meet each year and set up a permanent organization.)

December (NATO Ministerial Council instructed Permanent Council to study increased non-military cooperation).

1956

April (Secretary Dulles called for development of NATO into "the totality of its meaning".)

May (NATO Ministerial Council set up the Committee of Three "to advise the Council on ways and means to improve and extend NATO cooperation in non-military fields.")

July (U.S. Congress passed legislation making it a permanent member of NPC and providing for a delegation of 18 members each year.)

July-Sept. Declaration Sponsors prepared 20 recommendations for implementation of the Declaration which were submitted by a delegation to the Committee of Three. Thirteen of these adopted in whole or in part in their report.

Nov.-Dec. Following Suez crisis Director visited London, Paris, Bonn and The Hague. Attended Second NATO Parliamentary Conference. (Leaders of the U.S. Senate were present at this Conference which debated methods of improving political consultation and military, economic and cultural cooperation among the Atlantic allies. Committees were appointed to study these subjects further). Sponsors and signers of the Declaration were added in Iceland and Germany.

December (NATO Ministerial Council adopted the Committee of Three Report but governments lagged in its implementation.)

June Circular Letter sent to all signers calling for support of the Committee of Three Report, the NATO Parliamentary Conference and a citizens' conference "to explore all means of obtaining closer unity."

August U.S. Sponsors sent letter to President calling for: 1) settlement of NATO issues within NATO; 2) a major speech devoted to NATO; 3) a meeting of heads of NATO governments. Similar letters sent to the Prime Ministers of other NATO countries.

The Declaration was the only private group to work for such a meeting.

September U.S. Sponsors conferred with State Department on these questions.

Aug.-Nov. Director visited Iceland, Britain, Belgium, Germany, Greece, Italy, Luxembourg, France, conferring with Foreign Ministers, foreign office officials, and legislators in support of above proposals. He was Chairman of the Committee on Institutional Framework at the Bruges Conference on the Atlantic Community and helped secure the support of Lord Ismay and Mr. Spaak, past and present Secretary Generals of NATO, for a meeting of heads of governments.

Oct. 25. (Eisenhower-Macmillan "Declaration of Common Purpose and Interdependence" calls for meeting of heads of NATO governments in Paris in December.)

Nov. 11-16 (Third NATO Parliamentary Conference meets.) Director assisted in preparation of resolutions endorsing 1) an Atlantic Exploratory Conference; 2) an Atlantic Citizens' Congress; 3) an Atlantic Institute. Passed unanimously. He participated in European-American Committee meeting in Paris to set up Atlantic Institute. (Conference also passed important resolutions on scientific and technical, economic and political cooperation.)

Nov. 14. Second Circular Letter sent to signers of Declaration urging them to take initiative with their respective governments prior to the NATO "summit" conference December 16 - 18. Sponsors and signers of the Declaration added in Greece, Turkey and Luxembourg -- all NATO countries except Portugal.

Nov.-Dec. American, French, Canadian and other Sponsors submitted specific proposals for the "summit" meeting to their respective heads of governments. These proposals, and those of the NATO Parliamentary Conference, sent to the Sponsors in all countries with the request they take similar action.

Dec. 16-19 (The NATO heads of government met and issued a communique including the following significant statement: "Our Alliance cannot therefore be concerned only with the North Atlantic area or only with military defence. It must also organise its political and economic strength on the principle of interdependence, and must take account of developments outside its own area.")

Declaration of Atlantic Unity

We 271 citizens of Canada, the United States, Great Britain, France, the Netherlands, Belgium, Norway, Denmark, Iceland and Germany, address this APPEAL FOR ATLANTIC UNITY to our fellow citizens and to our governments which are represented on the Council of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

President Eisenhower has warned that "unity among free nations is our only hope of survival" and has declared that "NATO symbolizes the unity of free men in an age of peril." This is our conviction also. We must never forget that we are all bound together by our common belief in freedom under law.

The fourteen members of NATO have mutually guaranteed each other against armed aggression and merged under one command parts of their land, sea and air forces to make their pledge effective. NATO has succeeded in vastly reducing the danger of direct military attack in Europe. This success has caused the enemies of freedom to divert their military aggression to other areas and to concentrate on diplomatic manoeuvres to disrupt the unity of the NATO nations. Their efforts have been aided by voices of isolationism in each of our countries and by mutual recrimination. Thus, our peril from disunity has increased.

This is no time for half-hearted measures. While welcoming the progress made towards European union, we believe that nothing less than an effectively integrated Atlantic Community, which would include German defense forces, will in the end adequately meet the challenge of the times. Defense in today's terms extends beyond military requirements and into the political, economic and cultural aspects of our lives.

Yet NATO is still basically a military alliance. It is as long ago as 25 April, 1953, that the NATO Council of Ministers stated in their communique: "Convinced that in unity lies their greatest strength, they are resolved to broaden cooperation in every field, economic, political and social, as well as military, and so make the Atlantic Community a lasting reality." But little has since been done.

We call upon our governments to proceed now to redeem that pledge by initiating the following measures for which there is already authority under the North Atlantic Treaty:

1. The development of NATO as a central agency to coordinate the political, trade and defense policies of the member nations.
2. The elaboration, pursuant to Article II of the North Atlantic Treaty, of a comprehensive mutual program for lowering tariffs, freeing currencies and eliminating trade restrictions so that there may be established an adequate economic basis for the Atlantic Community and associated nations. Common economic action will give us not only better defense at less cost, but also the benefits of an expanding and thriving economy, thus raising the standards of living for the Atlantic Community and the whole free world.
3. The establishment by each of our legislatures of a parliamentary committee or association for NATO to further understanding in each member country of its progress and potentialities.
4. The creation of an advisory Atlantic Assembly, representative of the legislatures of the member nations, which would meet periodically to discuss matters of common concern. Observers could be invited from associated states.
5. The establishment by NATO of an Economic Advisory Council comprising representatives of employers and employees to advise the Council and other NATO bodies on the effect of their policies on the standard of living in the NATO countries, especially upon the working population.

We endorse the words of the Rt. Hon. Louis St. Laurent, Prime Minister of Canada, spoken at Bonn on February 10, 1954:

> "Perhaps the time has now come to consider whether some of the steps toward closer integration which we must take if our concept of civilization is not to perish, should be taken within the larger framework of the North Atlantic Community . . . many of us believe the peoples living about the great basin of the Atlantic Ocean might well seek the solution of their problems of economic betterment, political stability and self-defense in this closer integration of their national resources and of their machinery of government."

We remind our governments that NATO, in the words of its Secretary-General, "is something new and exciting and revolutionary, the most challenging and constructive experiment in international relations ever attempted."

We ask our fellow citizens to urge our respective governments to make this experiment succeed. We are convinced that in our ability to do so lies the well-being of us all.

Dear Ed:

As you have probably heard from Columbia Broadcasting, we have considered the "Hour with Montgomery" at great length and I wish I could tell you that our decision about sponsoring it was a positive one.

Unfortunately, we have decided to pass this one up, not the least reason being our inability at this short notice to do a proper job without any prior preparation in presenting Olin Mathieson. It also just does not fit into the time sequence of our overall television and print program.

I think your program is going to be a magnificent one and one which people should see and understand.

I hope to see you soon.

Dear Mr. Murrow,

Please accept my enthusiastic congratulations for last night's fine documentary, "The Business of Sex". The program had the undivided attention of several friends who listened with me and sparked a discussion that lasted until well after midnight.

Thank you for lifting radio to a level of mature, reasonable inquiry---with a point of view---which it reaches all too seldom.

I only hope that you receive enough favorable mail to encourage further investigation into the moral implications of our sad expense-account economy.

Oster, Gilbert

July 21, 1958

Dear Mr. Oster:

Very many thanks for your cordial letter of May 24.

I regret the delay in answering, but the truth is that letters sent to my home address do not always receive the prompt attention they deserve.

I greatly appreciate your kind words concerning my work and that of my colleagues and, like you, I must confess some concern about the men who will take over our task when that day (still somewhat in the future I trust!) comes. I feel that although some of us apparently seem rather ancient to you, we are of the age of fifty - regarded in our profession at least, as being in the prime of life.

I must point out to you that I am no longer a vice-president of CBS, having given up that post 11 years ago, when I elected to return to active broadcasting. Since that time, I have not been responsible for the hiring of CBS correspondents, and in that case, the responsibility must rest with the proper authority.

Sincerely yours,

Dear Mr. Murrow,

I am writing you at what I believe to be your home address. This is simply because I wish to address you as a person rather than as a vice-president.

It is my impression that the reportorial staff of CBS was largely assembleda at your direction shortly after the invasion of Poland. The only purpose of this letter is to congratulate you for your selections.

Through the years, I have appreciated the accuracy and dispassionate attitude of yourself and your colleagues. I refer specifically to Smith, LaSeur, Shoenbrun, and Collingswood. The lack of affective language in both this group and yourself does credit to human intelligence and reminds me greatly of some penetrating analyses which I heard at college.

As a former history teacher, fired for expressing my views on the current state of American education, I am happy to report that the CBS news programs and the New York Times were the sole sources of news which I recommended to my students.

I am rather younger than you, and I have a request. It is just that I hope you will, before another decade is past, replace some of your retiring colleagues with the same excellent caliber of intellect. The information and analysis expressed in these broadcasts is, in my opinion, the best widespread political education available to the public today. I hope you will be able to find the same qualities in the younger generation.

There have been afew times when I disagree with the results of the analysis byeither yourself or one of yourn colleagues, but even in disagreement, I can only concur with the method of your presentation.

Sincerely yours,

Dear Ed:

The editorial enclosed herewith, out of the Philadelphia Inquirer, January 23, 1958 is the height of gall.

Look who's pointing!

[redacted]

Edward R. Murrow's attempt, in a radio program earlier this week, to link business in general with the use of prostitutes to stimulate sales and clinch financial deals, was an exercise in both bad taste and bad judgment.

Through the fragmentary "confessions" of alleged participants in the sordid trade, all of whom have been kept carefully anonymous, Murrow sought to give the impression of the widespread employment of call girls in New York by business firms which hire them as "bait" for prospective customers.

For someone who carries on as though he were the journalistic Atlas of the world, this degrading type of broadcast is singularly low-level performance. Its implications are as false as its subject matter is tasteless. It should not be necessary to stoop this low to obtain a radio audience.

Mr. Murrow gains no distinction for himself by producing a "documentary" that is merely de[redacted]

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Dr. Hilde Himmelweit sent the attached letter addressed to you to us for forwarding. We feel that it is quite possible that you may not be able to identify the inquiry she refers to in her first paragraph from what she has said. The research she refers to was on the effects of television upon about 4,000 British children. A book entitled TELEVISION AND THE CHILD which we published here a little over a month ago is a report by Dr. Himmelweit and others on this research. We are sending you a copy of the book that should arrive at the same time as this letter or the latest within about 24 hours after this letter.

It is possible you may know of this research and the book since there has been a great deal of publicity in British newspapers and on British television about it and some publicity here in the United States which included: a news story in Time Magazine, and news stories that were syndicated in numerous newspapers across the United States recently.

The penned correction made in the second paragraph of Dr. Himmelweit's letter was made by the undersigned. This was obviously a slip on Dr. Himmelweit's part since the date she gives for her arrival here is January 12 and she wrote the letter in London on January 28. Her letter to me which enclosed the attached letter to you gave her arrival date here in New York City as February 12. I'm not sure that you will be interested in the following information but I don't believe there can be any harm in including it either. From a photograph that we have here in our office Dr. Himmelweit seems both young and photogenic. From reports that we have from our London office she seems to have given a very good account of herself on several television shows in England.

Her letter gives an address at which she can be reached while she is in New York and of course if we can help in any way we shall be very glad to.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

The Arkansas integration situation is being attacked on many fronts. It seems that one of the most effective and least known might be the subject of one of your telecasts. I am thinking of the economic development of the Arkansas, specifically Little Rock, area in the past two years.

In the past years, the industrial development groups have sprung up in cities all over the country. I would imagine these existed in the Arkansas area. What has been their progress in the post Faubus era? Is business going there? How are businesses doing that are already organized there, but who sell outside the state? Without an economic growth in the shape of new factories, there are less opportunities for the young people who are graduating from their schools, and this aggressive, enthusiastic group moves off into other areas where there is a market for their talent. It seems that this economic story could make a very interesting television documentary.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

If you felt the windows of your office rattle the other morning it was caused by my reaction to your speech at the RTND convention in Chicago.

What you said may be multiplied and applied equally to the press, and all organizations trusted with the informational welfare of this nation. I have completed a national tour which has amply confirmed the appalling inaptitude among the great as to how to communicate with the not so great.

But there is more to this than meets the eye.

Several years ago, I sweat out a concept of a TV mass communications project which would take the sting out communicating inspirational ideas and the shock of stopping to sell something.

I did not know what I had until I showed it to my friend Dr. Ken Welles, President of Freedoms Foundation. He said it was at once, the most lucid and immense concept to cross his desk, and that it was the best exposition of the "cracker-barrel" technique in modern times.

George Denny of Radio Town Hall Meeting fame, said I had stumbled on a technique where I didn't tell people what to think but I provoked thought.

Others, including General Van Fleet approved it as undoubtedly the common denominator of communication we have all been beating our brains out trying to find.

But there was an admonishing finger pointed from various directions: DON'T show it to anybody on Madison Avenue or in the TV business; that is, just yet - or the idea will be crucified.

And so I have waited patiently for the psychological time, and your speech signals both the time and the direction.

I do hope you will set aside a little time for me to show you my blueprints - they are all spelled out, and I can guarantee you will be intrigued both with the idea and the painless "commercials."

Dear Mr. Murrow:

With the aim of bringing to TV GUIDE's twenty-five million readers the best in current thought on THE STATE OF TELEVISION, we are asking the outstanding representatives in each major category of the medium's programming to present their points of view.

May we therefore invite you to participate in this editorial symposium? It will entail only the production by you of a 1,000-word article concisely presenting your opinion of American television - past, present and future - in general and also with particular reference to your own field of endeavor: News and News Features.

What are television's virtues? What are its defects? What can be done now - by the television industry itself, by the public, by agencies and sponsors, by anyone else - to make the television medium more effective in the service of the American people?

Yours would be the only piece on News and News Features. Others will cover a number of other categories, such as Drama, Playwriting, Direction, Scriptwriting, Cultural shows, Sports, etc.

TO Mr. Murrow

FROM Sheila Hogg April 20, 1959

Last year, you did not make a contribution to the Shakespeare Festival as such, although you spent $50 on benefit tickets. When you were approached about making a contribution last year, you had already left on your summer vacation, so nothing was done about it.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Last Spring when I talked to you in your office you very generously consented to assist the Festival in raising funds for the free presentations in Central Park. You had to leave town suddenly and it was impossible, therefore, to take advantage of your kind offer.

We are now in the midst of a campaign to raise funds for the summer, and perhaps you can come to our assistance. I am enclosing an invitation form to a benefit performance of Antony and Cleopatra which we are planning at the Heckscher Theater on January 13th. One specific way of helping the Festival raise money is this benefit. While we certainly encourage direct donations to the Festival (tax deductible), the benefit method is an enjoyable way to support Shakespeare in the parks.

I would very much appreciate hearing from you.

With very best wishes for the coming New Year,
I am,

Cordially,

Joseph Papp

Dear Mr. Murrow:

I had a very interesting session with Elmer Roper but it seems that the "fund" is primarily concerned with direct civil liberty issues rather than cultural procedures.

Our need for money is still great and I had hoped to receive from you, before you left, a list of people to contact. We are in rehearsal now for "Twelfth Night", our second production, and unless we receive financial help we may be forced to close down.

I would, therefore, sincerely appreciate your help in raising these seriously needed funds.

What did I give previously?

April 15, 1959

Dear Friend:

In spite of the present impasse with Commissioner Robert Moses (enclosures), we are prepared to go ahead with our program for the summer as soon as public opinion makes it possible. It would be a hollow victory indeed, should we regain the right to present our program in Central Park and find that we lack the funds to implement it. Your financial support, therefore, is mor urgently needed than ever before. I deeply appreciate the unstinting assistance you have given the Festival in the past years and hope you do not find my plea for further help overly presumptuous.

As important as the money is the writing of letters to newspapers, Mayor Robert F. Wagner, Commissioner Robert Moses and Manhattan Borough President Hulan Jack expressing your feelings about the issue. Telegrams and telephone calls will also be effective.

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE, PLEASE

MOSES DENIES USE OF CENTRAL PARK TO FREE SHAKESPEARE FESTIVAL
COMMISSIONER INSISTS ON $2.00, $1.00 CHARGE & 10% OF GROSS TO CITY
JOSEPH PAPP, PRODUCER OF FESTIVAL, & BOARD REFUSE TO ACCEPT CONDITIONS

Robert Moses, Commissioner of Parks, informed the N. Y. Shakespeare Festival that unless it abandons its policy of free admissions, it would no longer be permitted to operate in Central Park. In a surprising reversal of park regulations prohibiting the sale of seats in the Belvedere Lake area, he ordered the Festival to initiate a $2.00 and $1.00 charge for its outdoor presentations. He further stated that the Department of Parks would exact 10% of the gross revenue derived from admissions. A plea for a meeting to discuss the problem with him was summarily rejected by the Commissioner.

Joseph Papp, producer of the Festival, speaking for the Board, "It is impossible for us to meet these unexpected demands by the Commissioner. First of all, it is economically unfeasible. The net result would be that we would have to raise almost as much money - even if we played at capacity - as we would under our old policy of free admissions. The Commissioner made his demands, set a price, without even examining the costs.

"Indeed, it is perplexing and ironic that the man whose job it is to maintain and expand facilities for recreation and enjoyment in the public parks, would, instead, wipe out a project that has proven its worth through three successive Summers without tapping the public coffers.....Commissioner Moses' dictum would remove the productions from the reach of those whom it serves best.

"Commissioner Moses points out that by attracting people into an otherwise unused area of the Park, we were creating an erosion problem, and that this problem could only be solved by paving, a cost the operation must ultimately pay for. Erosion? Do people sitting and watching a play create more of an erosion problem than football, softball, soccer and similar sports encouraged by the Parks at no cost to the players? Perhaps the Park situation would be improved by more "soil erosion" caused by the gathering of two thousand people each night in an area where three years ago only squirrels dared to congregate?

"The situation of the Festival at this moment is best expressed by Hamlet, 'Whether 'tis nobler in the mind to suffer the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune or to take arms against a sea of troubles and by opposing, end them.' I hope that the people of the City of New York will use their influence to persuade the Commissioner to adjust his stand."

STATEMENT FROM JOSEPH PAPP, PRODUCER, N.Y. SHAKESPEARE FESTIVAL

Commissioner Moses has denied the N. Y. Shakespeare Festival the right to continue presenting its productions in Central Park free of charge. In a complete turnabout from his previous position, the Commissioner now states flatly that the Festival must enter into a commercial concessionaire's agreement with the Department of Parks, and must charge two dollars and one dollar for the two thousand seats in the Belvedere Tower area of Central Park. He also demands that ten percent (10%) of the gross receipts derived from the ticket sale be turned over to his department.

It is difficult for me to believe that Mr. Moses is deliberately trying to oust the Festival from Central Park. In the past, he has evidenced his awareness of the great need for cultural activities in our community. We can only assume that his actions on this occasion are ill-considered and that Mr. Moses himself is uninformed.

Indeed, it is perplexing and ironic that the man whose job it is to maintain and expand facilities for recreation and enjoyment in the public parks, would, instead, in effect, wipe out a project that has proven its worth through three successive summers without tapping the public coffers.

For the past three years, the N.Y. Shakespeare Festival itself has raised the necessary funds to present its productions to the public at no charge. Mr. Moses, a city official, now takes it upon himself to insist that the public must pay for something it has been accustomed to getting for nothing. Odd that a public servant should chop down perhaps the only existing hedge against inflationary prices in the Theatre.

Since informing us of his decision, Mr. Moses has refused to discuss it, and has thus ignored the many reasons for our policy of "no admission charge".

In the past three years of our operation, the Festival has had occasion to hoist distress signals, prompting well intentioned persons to ask, "Why not charge admissions as a solution to your financial problems?" Perhaps Mr. Moses has already asked himself the same question. If so, he's abandoning the ship before any leak has sprung. (At the time of Mr. Moses' letter, the Festival had over $15,000 on hand and promises of another $10,000 and is on the agenda of three Foundations who had previously given grants totalling over $35,000). Worse, he answered a question rightfully directed to us. These are the answers I would have given had he listened.

Were we to concede that charging admission was desirable, we would have had to conclude that it was economically unfeasible. Whereas we formerly mounted our productions for about $12,000 and operated each week for about $3,000. Commissioner Moses' plan of admissions would more than triple these figures.

One simple example. During the past three seasons, the Festival did not spend one penny for advertising. A comparable commercial production in New York City might easily spend $5,000 pre-opening and $2,000 per week of operating. On a three week run of our first production we would necessarily be spending $10,000 for advertising alone. This sum represents the entire cost of playing for three and a half weeks under our previous no admission charge basis.

On a free admission basis, operating as a public service, all the Theatrical Unions have cooperated and made concessions even beyond those accorded an off-Broadway operation. The Commissioner has set our weekly capacity at $18,000. Certainly, no Union could be expected to make such concessions to an operation that has such a potential. Further, under such conditions, I would be the first to demand a living wage for all those concerned with the operation. Why should an actor work for $40 a week? Why should a press agent contribute his services?

There is no point to itemizing the budget here. Suffice it to note that in addition to more than doubling the existing salaries, "The charge or get out" policy of the Commissioner would necessitate additional salaries, a sum that in itself would exceed our former weekly operating cost. Also, Mr. Moses proposes to take away 10% of what comes in before we begin paying our costs. In sum, (providing Mr. Moses can keep the rains from falling) playing at capacity, we would still have to raise money from outside sources to cover costs.

Without appointing myself an expert on the economy of Broadway, I think it safe to state that the average Broadway play can break even at anywhere from 40% to 60% of capacity - and that at $6.90 to $9.00 top. Mr. Shakespeare wrote his plays with no consideration for the economy that would prevail here some 350 years later. His plays require exceedingly large casts and a considerable number of costumes and props. For these and other reasons, Shakespeare is not deemed "commercial" today. The American Shakespeare Festival in Connecticut, for example, charging a $4. top during its most successful season was forced to supplement its box-office intake with thousands of dollars in contributions. The City Center operations continually lose money, yet the City wisely continues to grant them the use of their building rent free. No request for ten percent of the gross here. Even charging Mr. Moses' prices, the Shakespeare Festival would most assuredly lose its hair shirt.

Quite simply, the only reason we were able to survive in the past was because of our low cost of operation.

I have only lightly touched on the economy imposed by Mr. Moses' paying formula. I hope, nevertheless that from an economic standpoint it answers the question, "Why not charge to get in?"

Beyond this, there is another even more basic reason for our not wishing to charge admission. The precept upon which the Festival was founded is that there existed a gaping void in the cultural life of our city. Despite the tremendous accomplishments of the Broadway Theatre, the overwhelming majority of New Yorkers have rarely been exposed to live Theatre and seldom, if ever, to the incomparable magic of Shakespeare. Our intent was to create a beginning in this void. I do not think it immodest to claim that the Festival has indeed made such a beginning.

Commissioner Moses' arbitrary dictum would remove the productions from the reach of those whom it best serves. Further, we have found that even if those of our audience who could pay, did so, the financial problems still remain.

There exists in our lives today educational and cultural institutions which are considered so essential to our well-being that their very existence is recognized as a public responsibility -- schools, museums and libraries. I do not think a responsible public official would suggest charging for the use of these as a source of revenue. Why eliminate a Shakespeare Company that does not even use taxpayers money to operate?

In his letter to the Festival advising us that we must agree "to charge admission and to enter into a regular concession agreement with the Department of Parks", Commissioner Moses points out that by attracting people into an otherwise unused area of the Park, we were creating an erosion problem, and that this problem could only be solved by paving, a cost the operation must ultimately pay for. Erosion? Do people sitting and watching a play create more of an erosion problem than football, softball, soccor and similar sports encouraged by the Parks at no cost to the players?

The situation of the Festival at this moment is best expressed by Hamlet, "Whether 'tis nobler in the mind to suffer the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune or to take arms against a sea of troubles and by opposing, end them". Perhaps the Park situation would be improved by more "soil erosion" caused by the gathering of two thousand people each night in an area where three years ago only squirrels dared to congregate?

OUTLINE HISTORY OF NEW YORK SHAKESPEARE FESTIVAL AND RELATIONSHIP WITH CITY OF NEW YORK AND DEPARTMENT OF PARKS

(The New York Shakespeare Festival is the result of operating as a Shakespeare Workshop at the Emanuel Church on East 6th Street in Manhattan from 1954-56)

1. February 24, 1956 - The Department of Parks issues a Permit to the Shakespeare Festival to present a series of plays written by Shakespeare in the Amphitheatre, East River Drive & Grand Street

* The permit was issued after the Company agreed to abide by Park Department regulations such as: the plays be open to all without restrictions; no tickets to be issued and no charges to be made.

Two productions were presented ("Julius Caesar" and "Taming Of The Shrew")

All persons involved contributed their services without financial remuneration. $1,000 was spent to mount and operate the two productions. $750. was donated by Herman Levin and $250 supplied by the Shakespeare Workshop.

On March 28, 1956, the Department of Parks issued a Press Release announcing the forthcoming Season at the Amphitheatre saying, "The Shakespearean Workshop is an educational, non-profit organization chartered by the State Education Department. Its purpose is to encourage and cultivate interest in poetic drama with emphasis on Shakespeare".

Success was immediate. People living in the area of the Lower East Side filled the seats hours before sundown. Most of these people had never seen a professionally mounted stage play. Word of this unique enterprise seeped uptown and soon began attracting many people of the Theatre.

In addition to its immediate contribution to the community life of that area, the project was deemed unique and important enough for the State Department to do a cover story on it for its official magazine, "Amerika", which is distributed in the Soviet Union. Photographs of the project, and of scenes from the plays were used to illustrate a High School text-book on Shakespeare, published by Harcourt-Brace.

2. The success of the first Summer's operation provided the stimulus for the adventurous plans projected for the subsequent summer : a portable production mounted on the bed of a trailer truck that unfolded into a stage and set that would be hauled to parks in the five boroughs of New York City.

* On April 10, 1957, the Park Department gave the Festival permission to perform in the parks of the five boroughs, again stipulating that the sale of tickets was prohibited.

On May 27, 1957, before the opening of the first production, Stuart Constable, Executive Officer, representing Robert Moses, Commissioner, Department of Parks, wrote to Joseph Papp, Managing Director, New York Shakespeare Festival, saying "I feel sure that these productions will give much pleasure to the patrons of our public parks." and "We are very happy to cooperate with you in this fine public service."

3. June 27, 1957 "Romeo and Juliet" opened in Central Park and, as planned, toured the parks of the five boroughs.

The demands of hauling, taking down and setting up were so prohibitive that the two following productions, "Two Gentlemen of Verona" and "Macbeth" settled down and played only in Central Park.

The project was extraordinarily successful. The Theatre critics were generous in their appraisal of the work and the citizens of New York and their visitors swarmed to the scene filling to overflowing the 1,800 free seats in the Belvedere Lake site.

August 6, 1957, Stuart Constable, representing Commissioner Moses wrote to Joseph Papp, "Since our last meeting I have discussed with Commissioner Moses the whole subject of Shakespeare in the parks. Your productions have been most successful and we want you to continue the outdoor performances in the new Lincoln Square Park. However, since this area won't be ready for use for several years, we suggest you plan to continue in Central Park"..."We would like to talk with you at your earliest convenience concerning next year's program in the parks. We want to help and must know as soon as possible how we can best do this."

August 23, 1957, Mr. Constable wrote to Howard S. Cullman "We will do everything we can to assist this group (N.Y. Shakespeare Festival)".

August 27, 1957, Commissioner Moses wrote to Mrs. Guido Pantaleoni, President, United States Committee for UNICEF, "I have your letter of August 21. Mr. Papp's Shakespeare in the Parks has been a real success. We are very much interested in the continuation of these productions and shall do everything we can to help." And, "The Summer program which provides excellent recreation for tens of thousands every week during the season is the one which appeals to us and the one we shall support."

Tuesday, October 1, 1957, Commissioner Moses wrote a signed piece printed in a New York newspaper in which he described the project as follows, "These are gateless, outdoor free shows with no admission charges....It was remarkable to see the interest on the part of people in the surrounding area....It's exciting and stimulating."

4. December 27, 1957, Commissioner Moses wrote to Joseph Papp with respect to the Summer of 1958, "If you can as you did last summer raise sufficient funds to defray your production and incidental costs, we will cooperate with you as we did last summer in Central Park."

With the co-operation of the Department of Parks, the summer season of 1958 in Central Park was an even greater success than the one preceeding. Two plays were presented, "Othello" and "Twelfth Night". The Park Department had improved the site and enlarged the seating capacity to 2,300. Again these were occupied long before the sun went down permitting the stage lighting to come up.

Brooks Atkinson, Drama Critic of the New York Times, in his review of the opening was moved to remark upon the project "Shakespeare in the Park is a wonderful institution. Certainly, it deserves all the support that is available. For the long, patient line of people hoping to get into an amphitheatre that seats 2,300 is a humbling sight for anyone who believes in the theatre. And the alert attention of the people who do succeed in getting in chastens anyone familiar with sophisticated theatre audiences."

5. August 20, 1958, (anent the plans for 1959) Stuart Constable, representing Commissioner Moses, wrote to Joseph Papp, "I have your letter of August 19. We are glad to hear that our cooperation has been satisfactory and that you believe you are going to be able to put the financing of your Summer Shakespeare Festival on a sound basis. We, of course, shall continue to cooperate as we have in the past."

September 4, 1958, Stuart Constable wrote to the Commissioner of Public Works, Frederick H. Zurmuhlen, "Another successful summer season of free Shakespeare productions in Central Park has just come to a close. It is estimated that 110,000 people enjoyed these performances."

January 7, 1958, Commissioner Moses wrote to Joseph Papp, "If you can within the next two or three months raise funds for next summer's productions we will be very happy to cooperate with you as we have in the past".

March 18, 1959 WAS RECEIVED THE FIRST WRITTEN COMMUNICATION FROM COMMISSIONER MOSES THAT THE WORKING POLICY OF THE PAST THREE YEARS WAS UNILATERALLY BEING CHANGED BY HIM. FROM NOW ON, THE POLICY OF FREE ADMISSIONS WAS NO LONGER PERMISSIBLE.
In a letter to Joseph Papp, Mr. Moses wrote, "Unless, therefore, you are prepared to agree to charge admission and to enter into a regular concession agreement with the Department of Parks (10% of the gross receipts to go to the Dept. of Parks), we cannot give you a permit to operate in the City Park System in 1959."

Later, Commissioner Moses, through Executive Officer, Stuart Constable, set the price of these tickets as two dollars ($2.00) and one dollar ($1.00)

For the reasons proferred in his statement, Mr. Papp, in concert with the Board of the New York Shakespeare Festival, was unable to accept Mr. Moses dictum.

Dear Sir:

In preparing inclosed statement, for your optional consideration, no attempt has been made to treat the subject, (MAN - SURVIVAL OF UNFITTEST) theoretically.

The greatest tragedy of the human race may be the failure of mankind to apply GENETICAL common sense and reason.

Can medical science, with its services, catch up with the forces of mental and physical destruction caused by careless blind selection of mates?

We have a biological and genealogical problem concerning ourselves. The present method, of blind selection of mates, will not improve mental and physical quality of offspring.

We can not afford to ignore our obligation to posterity. Breaking the shackles of ignorance will not be easy, however a breakthrough may be possible. It all depends on thinking people who are interested in progress and physical improvement.

Sincerely yours,

Hervey W. Parham

Hervey W. Parham

MAN - SURVIVOR OF UNFITTEST

Geographical man has cruelly and perpetually contributed the best of his kind (mentally and physically) for combat services. This method of barbarious extermination has been going on for thousands of years.

Each generation, by some kind of selective service procedure, selects the best of the male left overs from preceding generation. Does this degenerative biological procedure account for the general breakdown in humane relations? Could it be the main cause for jails, hospitals and insane asylums being overcrowded?

How long would our food supply last if farmers selected the best of plants and lower animals for extermination? Millions of dollars are invested in pedigree animals every year and we do this without thinking of our own physical genealogical heritage.

The theory, SURVIVAL OF THE FITTEST, may hold good when applied to lower animals. Nature cruelly liquidates a great portion of unfortunate weaklings. Man has unconsciously reversed this principle.

Medical science laboriously rehabilitates millions of unfortunate weaklings. Hundreds of thousands of these are continually drifting into reproduction channels. How can we expect mankind to intelligently survive under such unfavorable conditions? Destruction and construction are close running mates of so-called civilization.

Man has ignorantly demonstrated his destructive ability, by doing many things that pull him down, mentally and physically. The odds for improvement weigh heavily against contemporary man and the unborn. Mentally and physically, we are a poor risk and we have little or no reason to be proud of our inheritance.

It positively boils down to the fact that we are the offspring of a long line of weaklings and rejectees. If we are to improve the mental and physical qualities of mankind, we will have to about face and drift away from the present method of blind selection of mates.

Continued breeding and mixing of different strata of humane degenerates will continue to be disasterous. Regardless of religion, politics or any other philosophy pertaining to life of man, we should do something to improve humane reproduction conditions.

Each country and race should begin now to physically improve the stock of its people. They should stress the importance (through educational channels) of race improvement by the application of selective reproduction reasoning. We have the potential, (mental and physical) to be, SURVIVORS OF THE FITTEST. Which shall it be, THE FITTEST OR UNFITTEST?

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Attached is an idea for a TV broadcast program that might have exceptional popularity if done as only you could do it.

My interest in this type of program stems from my former close association with the police in all branches of law enforcement.

Formerly a Special Agent, Department of State, Investigator, U.S. Department of Labor, and Special Investigator, Office of the Attorney General, State of New Hampshire, as well as formerly a Deputy Sheriff and uniformed police officer, I have a well founded idea of its potential.

I have had confidential association with the Seattle, San Francisco, Chicago, New York and Boston Police Departments, and other State and County agencies throughout the nation, and would like to discuss this with you if you feel so inclined.

Please be assurred that the highest type official written recommendations are available if desired, and I am seeking nothing in extending this idea to you. If my technical experience would be of any value, I would be delighted if it be retained nominally and utilized.

Very truly yours

A recitation by the MC of the case his deductions helped solve, a pictorial if possible of some of the actual scenes, and the questions by the Panel. Contestants will appear in Uniform if their service was in uniform. A special guest each program will be the Honorable Edgar Hoover, and other personages of high Law Enforcement office. A sponsors gift, and a "Jackpot Prize of $5000" will go to the winner who's suggestions to the Panel eventually lead to solving the Crime in question.

I have your letter of February 13th.

Since I have no control over any programs other than my own, I am afraid that it would be useless to discuss your program idea with me.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

This letter is a request to have an appointment with you regarding plans for a new television show.

~~It is my belief~~ that the youth of our nation-and perhaps the adults- would greatly benefit from a program which would bring the children from other countries into their homes via television. Unfortunately, the children of the U.S.A. have little or no idea how the boys and girls live in Germany, France, Russia and other nations. I would like to show them these other children-in school, at home, while they play, etc.-all the phases of a child's life in a country foreign to our country.

As a teacher who has lived and worked in foreign countries, I believe a show of this type would be highly valuable as well as interesting at this present time because of the increased focus on other nations, the idea of greater communication and understanding between the U.S.A. and the countries of the world, and the current interest in education in countries other than our own.

It is a well-known fact that one person cannot like another person or group unless he knows them. How can our children like the other children of the world unless they know all about them and the way they live? How can they know them unless it is through a media like television? If we want a world of peace and understanding, it is imperative that our children know these "foreign" children because the youth of today will be the leaders of tomorrow.

I am asking you to help me with this program because I feel that you and the Columbia Broadcasting System are interested in broadening the horizons of learning and understanding for the people of the United States.

If you are interested in discussing plans for a show of this type, please contact me at the above address.

Thank you for your cooperation.

Very truly yours,

Patricia A. Patterson

Dear Mr. Murrow:

For many years I listened to your daily news broadcasts and always waited for the end of the program to hear the quotations that you gave in closing.

The quotations that you gave on the last program in the year particularly impressed me. These quotations were, I believe from the German poets Goethe and Heine. Since you will not be giving these quotations at the end of 1959 I would like very much to have them to reflect upon as the year ends.

If you will send these quotations to me I shall be most grateful.

Yours very truly,

Dear Ed:

I am glad we may have softened somewhat your understandable disdain for the current plethora of citations. Perhaps even Fred will relent a bit under your influence.

What did you think of the Wriston-Conant luncheon discussion the other day about strengthening the frontiers of freedom? I was disturbed that such an eminent collection of men should place so much stress on the military aspirations of our day, in an age in which the technological revolution in warfare and in political infiltration has realistically made military aid subordinate, if not obsolete, in comparison to an efficiently and sensitively executed program of basic economic assistance.

I thought Wriston's own opening statement was quite eloquent, however.

With cordial regards,

As ever,

Dear Pat:

You have elevated me far beyond my stature. Please forgive the delay in answering yours of February 19th, but it takes a little while to get over the shock.

I do, in fact, hope to spend a year in receiving rather than transmitting, but if I am overwhelmed with the urge to committing something to paper, I shall certainly send it along.

In any event, I shall cherish your letter as proof-positive that I once had an opportunity to write for the most distinguished periodical in the country.

Dear Ed:

I think every friend and champion of the creative use of television as a communications rather than a purely entertainment medium is both dismayed and goaded into action by the news of your pending leave of absence.

On the other hand, I am delighted for you as well as for our citizenry because I am confident you will return from a year of reading and reflecting so refreshed and invigorated that the airways will crackle with your ideas.

Fred Friendly says that he hopes that during this period you will become an even closer associate of Saturday Review - as a reader. This was his true blue and predictable reaction to a very strong feeling of Norman Cousins and myself - that we would like to offer you a page in Saturday Review anytime you find you have something on your mind you would like to say or some interpretive report you might like to make on something you have read or observed during this year.

No deadline is involved - you could do this as often or as seldom as you wished.

I realize that you have no shortage of forums at your disposal and that you want to spend this year receiving, so to speak, rather than transmitting, but nevertheless I thought you might like to know that your own page is waiting for you in Saturday Review whenever the spirit moves you, wherever you are.

Meanwhile may I say thanks for all the wonderful things you and Fred have done to enlighten all of us and to wish you a happy, fruitful and memorable year of reflection and spiritual refreshment.

Best regards,

As ever,

Dear Mr. Murrow:

I wish to thank you very sincerely on behalf of Mr. Gacki and myself for giving us the opportunity to talk with you, to learn a little better the vital problems facing American radio and TV, and to familiarize ourselves with the needs and interests of the American audience.

During the course of our conversation you pointed out that in the near future you are planning to visit Poland and Yugoslavia and that you are interested in knowing with whom you should talk there and who might be good persons to interview. I enquired among some of my Yugoslav friends and concerning Yugoslavia they suggest the following people:

Dr. Ivo ANDRIC - author, member of the Serbian Academy of Science, pre-war Yugoslav Minister to Germany. He is one of the best known contemporary Yugoslav writers. Two of his works, "Travnik Chronicle" and "The Bridge on the Drina," were recently translated into English.

Branko COPIC - author, a communist. His last novel, "Silent Powder," demonstrates deep human sensitivity.

Dr. Oskar DANON - director of the Belgrade Opera. He is one of the best known contemporary Yugoslav opera conductors and a composer.

From among leading Yugoslav communists are suggested:

Edvard KARDELJ - Tito's deputy and Party ideologist.

Rodpljub COLAKOVIC - Vice-President of the Federal Executive Council in charge of Education and Culture.

Svetozar VUKMANOVIC-TEMPO - Chairman of the League of Labor Unions.

Alexander RANKOVIC - Vice-President of the Federal Executive Council in charge of security.

I list those names with reservation as the majority of them are communists and that fact speaks for itself. Nevertheless, in the present circumstances they are members of a group of people who can talk freely.

With reference to Poland, the situation is more delicate and complicated. There is no doubt that a degree of political relaxation took place after the so-called October Revolution of 1956. Some liberalization of internal conditions in comparison with other communist countries still exists, but there are various limits and reservations which should be taken into consideration. The open, organized political opposition to the regime, for almost all practical purposes, is non-existent; the Catholic Church, although a very powerful force, is in a precarious position; writers, scientists, and artists are more and more under government control. That explains the basic difficulty of talking with those people who stay in opposition to the regime and are not active in government and Party machine, especially when they are aware that publicity will be given to their statements. Some of those people would probably decline to talk or at least would limit their answers to platitudes. At the same time representatives of all the above mentioned categories of people are of course the most interesting potential target for your radio programs.

I describe the above problem at length to indicate the obstacles which you will probably encounter in trying to find proper persons to interview. Unpublicized talks with those people is quite a different matter and might prove to be extremely interesting.

On the other hand I recommend to you, but with the same reservations made in respect to the Yugoslavs, to arrange in Poland interviews with some interesting personalities from among the communist leaders, particularly if they were forced to answer various questions embarrasing for themselves. On a separate piece of paper I take the liberty to suggest some questions. The Party members besides Gomulka who might be suitable for that purpose are:

Jerzy MORAWSKI - Secretary of the Central Committee of the Party. There are speculations that he is a potential successor of Gomulka.

Edward OCHAB - Minister of Agriculture, former First Secretary. A dedicated Communist, energetic and able trouble shooter.

S. JEDRYCHOWSKI - Deputy Premier for Economic Planning. He enjoys a high reputation as an economic expert.

Marian SPYCHALSKI - Minister of National Defense, close friend of Gomulka. During Stalinist era spent few years in prison where he underwent serious tortures.

Adam RAPACKI * Minister of Foreign Affairs, known for the Rapacki Plan.

Zenon NOWAK - A leading Stalinist, one of the most loyal pro-Moscow men in the Party.

I hope that the above information might be of some help to you. Please accept, Mr. Murrow, my kind regards.

Sincerely yours,

Tadeusz A. Pawlowicz

A list of questions

1. How is it possible to explain the apathy and indifference of a very large segment of Polish population towards the Party? (Open complaints of numerous Party officials and communist press. Gomulka himself underlined that in his speech on March 10, 1959 at the III Congress of the Party.)

2. Why the percentage of workers and peasants is proportionally small among the total Party membership? (Open complaints of numerous Party officials and communist press.)

3. Why after 14 years of communist rule in Poland there are numerous complaints that a painful lack of proper young Party cadres exists. (Open complaints of numerous Party officials.)

4. Why the "Polish own road to socialism" or the "Polish October", the expressions commonly used in Poland after the October 1956 revolution had been completely withdrawn from the vocabulary of the Third Party Congress in March 1959?

5. How Polish Communist leaders can be certain that after unification and neutralization of Germany, Germany will not return to her traditional policy expressed clearly in Rapallo and will not succeed in convincing Russia to make territorial changes at Poland's expense?

6. How is it possible to explain the fact that few millions of Americans of Polish descent who in overwhelming majority are of proletarian origin are so violently critical of the present system existing in Poland?

7. How is it possible to interpret Gomulka's statement of March 10, 1959 when at the Third Party Congress he declared that university lectures on political, economic and social philosophy should be conducted exclusively in accordance with Marxist spirit.

8. How is it possible to explain that in Lodz, the second largest Polish city, fourteen years after the war, housing conditions are so deplorable as they are described by the Secretary of the local Party Committee in her speech delivered on March 12, 1959 at the Third Party Congress?

Dear Mr. Murrow:

As you know, one of our chief aims is to familiarize our audiance in the captive countries of Europe about various aspects of life in America. To meet that task we send out correspondents to visit numerous plants, laboratories, educational centers, coal mines, dairy farms, etc. We talk to the managers of large corporations and leading figures of the labor world, we interview various scientists, educators and judges. Translated texts of all such talks and interviews we beam to the countries behind the Iron Curtain. That way we wish to bring our listeners closer to the American way of life and American institutions.

Since your work is an institution in itself, it deserves our special attention. That is why we would be greatful if you could spare a little of your time and, for a change, allow our leading correspondent to interview you briefly on some basic aspects of your work.

January 26, 1959

Dear Sir,

I wish to refer to yesterday's TV feature, "Small World" in which Brandt (W. Berlin) first ignored Britain in a reply, and when his attention was drawn, to this, supplemented his reply by saying, "Well, 2½ nations" - the HALF Power being Britain.

Words fail me, but I am still boiling at such a public insult. Did we, or did we not, defeat these people in two wars?? and whence comes this new idea that the U.S. did all the defeating? I was in Britain through both wars, until August 1951, and I boil at the idea that all that tremendous strain and effort seems now just negatived. But when it comes to a German saying such a thing to the TV huge audience ---------Well!

I therefore call you to what I consider to be your duty - to protest publicly to Mr. Murrow and the producers of "Small World" for broadcasting that remark, when it should in decency have been expunged. Such an insult should NOT be passed over in silence. Soon, we will have to apologise for being Britons.

Please do not just send me a letter of platitudes, or I shall boil again. You are the official spokesman of Her Majesty's Government here, and surely it is your duty to slough off this insult.

Yours faithfully

Thank you for your letter about the January 25th edition of the television programme "Small World".

I would share your indignation except that, as I did not see the programme myself, I have been carefully through the script and do not think the passage you referred to was intended to be hostile and insulting to Great Britain. It reads as follows:

"BRANDT: I would feel much more happy if these weapons could be limited to two or two and a half world powers, if...

MURROW: What do you mean by two and a half world powers, Mr. Mayor?

BRANDT: Well, I wouldn't insult Great Britain.

FOOT: I certainly don't take any insult because he talks of the two and a half powers, because I had been all in favor of Britain giving up these weapons.

BRANDT: But let me say three world powers.

Mrs. L.M. Garrett
36 Elm Street, Apt. 17
Morristown, N.J.

.....2/

"MURROW: Right. While we are adding up world powers, let's take out a minute for Olin Mathieson. This conversation between Mayor Willy Brandt in Berlin, Michael Foot in London, and Dr. James Conant in San Francisco, will continue in just a moment.

COMMERCIAL

ANNOUNCER:

Now back to Edward R. Murrow and SMALL WORLD.

MURROW: Well, Mayor Brandt, now that we have settled for three atomic powers, why don't you continue where you were?"

You will see that they were talking about strength in nuclear weapons, and Mayor Brandt used a phrase which, though accurate, was as you point out, not a very good one. He was promptly taken up by Mr. Murrow, and as promptly amended the remark, despite the endorsement of the British member of the group. In all these circumstances, I feel that I should not be on very strong ground in taking it up officially with CBS, but I shall make your views known to Mr. Murrow.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

I learned the other day from the newspapers and also from my friend, Mr. Rex Campbell, of KSL, that you would be absent from CBS for a long period and that we would no longer have the pleasure of listening to your broadcasts. I will miss See It Now and special programs such as you made from South Africa, and those on our own integration problem, and on schools a couple of years ago. I frankly state that I will not miss Person to Person which I never cared for and which most of my friends have regarded as mediocre.

However, I hope that you will use your period of leisure and reflection to devise sound improvement in general television programs; as well as to chart a course for yourself which will enable us, the T-V viewers, to get optimum benefit from the exercise of your talents. May I put these suggestions in some kind of order?

1. First, as to general T-V programs: My favorite news program is NBC's Huntley-Brinkley Report. (We seldom see Eric Sevareid here in Salt Lake City). I think it would be unwise for CBS to try to compete with this report at the same broadcast time. But, a round-up on the news in the morning or at noon(Mountain Standard Time) would be welcome.

I should also like to see a real question-period to give me, a typical T-V viewer, something to take the taste of Meet The Press out of my mouth (or din out of my ears?). As certain reviewers of Alsop's Fables have pointed out, the press, and this includes T-V news commentators and interrogators, has delusions of omnicompetence. I think that some experienced academic interrogators (political scientists if the subject is politics, but the choice of discipline should depend on the subject) could ask questions which would be prudential and which would be designed to reveal pertinent information. Spivak has a prosecuting attorney complex: he assumes that his "guests" (victims would be a better word) are indicted criminals. Interrogations of guests should be conducted in the public interest. They should not be accusatory: nor should they be exercises in eliciting remarks of self-adulation or mutual admiration, as were the questions poor little Martha Roundtree used to present to Mollie Malone. They should be the kind of questions a mature, wise and benign professor puts to candidates in a doctoral examination.

2. Second, as to your own future career. I think that the studies made by social scientists of radio and television are reasonably complete. But I should like to see now some well-documented, authoritative and practical suggestions for the use of television for popular education. Your old See-it-Now programs could serve as a model. Not all of the current Educational T-V should be abolished: it seems to be used well for teaching languages and mathematics; but I don't think the Fund for the Republic (WGBH-TV) programs are very satisfactory. As I said, it isn't more studies we need; but some one with your background reflecting upon the problem; and coming up with a proposal.

I have never had the opportunity of meeting you in person. Once, during the War, Mrs. Murrow invited me to have tea with her; I had a letter of introduction from Mrs. Latham, then with Bundles for Britain. Your wife gave me a letter to Lady Reading which I was never able to use, as I was sent out of London almost immediately. At the end of the War, I was Chief of USIS in Copenhagen: we tried to get you to visit us but were unsuccessful. I hope that you will spend part of your leave in Stockholm and Copenhagen -- and also in Helsinki. At any rate, I think that many liberals will be disappointed if you do not accept the challenge to draw up a constructive program for the social use of television.

I thought it was so interesting!

Tuning in the week before though, I wondered if Admiral Rickover should not have read a fact sheet about Van Doren and R. West before he went on the air. I only wanted to see the show to see what my idol Rebecca West looked like, and Mark Van Doren. Then I realized that Admiral R. must have been uninformed on who they were!

'A' Young Man and An Idea To Combat JD

By Maurice Paul

Like the weather, everybody talks about juvenile delinquency. But unlike the old saw about the weather, somebody IS doing something about JD. And that somebody is Leonard Perlman, 28, of 8712 Ave. B, here in Brooklyn.

Lenny, as everybody calls him after five minutes in his company, is a writer for an advertising agency. He goes to Brooklyn College nights and gives every available moment of his free time to serving as a volunteer social worker.

Lenny has notions of his own as to what is wrong—and right—with our young people these days. He has some pretty defined ideas, too, about the role which the city and some of its departments are playing in the "eradication" of JD.

We found Lenny Perlman to be a serious, determined young man with an ideal—and THAT can be quite an interesting combination! When we interviewed him he had just been reading about Magistrate Glowa's blast against youth centers as a "crime breeding" focus. His first remarks dealt with the Magistrate's comments.

"I read recently, "said Lenny, "about that remark made by Magistrate Glowa that community centers are the worst breeding grounds of youth crime in the city. It's a shame that he didn't elaborate further on this point."

STOPPED A GANG FIGHT

The young Brooklynite who recently stopped a gang-fight single-handed continued: "It was an explosive remark and should have been clarified. However, since the remark was made, I wonder if it wouldn't be presumptuous on my part if I chipped in my two cents!"

He means it, for despite the fact that he works and plays with some of the "toughest" kids in Brooklyn, he is himself a quiet, reserved sort of guy. But, again, that "quiet man" sort of thing doesn't fool the neighborhood gangs too much—they also happen to know that Lenny is an ex-wrestler and boxer of some repute.

Lenny believes that there is some truth in Magstrate Glowa's remark about many of the City youth centers becoming a hangout for teenage gangs. This sort of thing may be anticipated whenever a youth center is established, says Lenny, and there are reasons for it.

THE COMMUNITY CENTER

"Community centers do serve a valuable purpose," says Lenny. "They get the teenagers off the street and provide a place for them and activities which they can enjoy if they wish. Where the city bogs down," the head of the Perlman Athletic Club continued, "is in failing to provide for that very small percentage of boys who, for one reason or another, cannot fit in with the larger community group and its activities."

The young friend of teenaged kids in our borough explained that it is these discontented, rootless boys who tend to "hang around" and become annoying and offensive when they are finally "thrown out" of the youth centers. These kids who find every hand raised against them and every door locked against them will inevitably band together into gangs and "go for" other youngsters — and often, adults—in the neighborhood.

The End Result of Juvenile Delinquency

HOSTILE YOUTHS

It is these hostile youths, says the volunteer social worker, who must be dealt with if the youth centers are to be able to fulfill the function for which they were created. Can't the instructors and teachers who deal with the youngsters at the youth centers take care of these more difficult kids?

"No," answers Lenny unequivocally. "Let's face it," he says moodily, "most night center instructors are middle-aged school teachers using this as a second job to supplement their income. They're not going to get involved in things which they feel they cannot control or which they see as merely a secondary job with no overall future for themselves.

"They know well enough that some of these neighborhood toughs are quite capable of beating up any adult who doesn't please them. The kids have no real respect for these instructors and it is no reflection whatsoever on the latter. It's just the way things are under the present set-up."

TEACHER'S SALARIES

Lenny is asked if he has any ideas on correcting this state of affairs. "First of all, school teachers should be paid an adequate salary so they don't have to turn to night youth centers to supplement their income. That is a job which properly belongs to youth athletic instructors who can properly supervise all activities and command respect for their strength and athletic ability—the only thing which most of these rootless youngsters can immediately grasp and accept."

Lenny doesn't believe that athletics alone can do the trick, but it is a good beginning, a bridge to the youngsters who feel "outside" of things. There should be at least two social workers on hand at each center to provide for individual kids who need help. And, (and this last is vital, emphasizes Lenny) the adults of the community MUST TAKE PART in these projects.

IT IS ESSENTIAL THAT THE BOYS KNOW THAT THE ADULTS IN THE COMMUNITY ARE WITH THEM.

The "Let George Do It" attitude which infects so many of our citizens contributes as much fuel as any other single factor to the spread of JD, declares Lenny Perlman, and he should know. There are kids in every community who just do not fit into any organized civic sponsored group and it is precisely these kids who must be seen as the problem of the community itself.

GUIDANCE AND UNDERSTANDING

These young boys need the guidance, love and understanding which they cannot get at home. Sure, they are unlovable when you first meet them, says the youth worker, but it is precisely when they are most unlovable that they most need love!

It is up to the neighborhood to provide a place and TLC — tender loving care — for these unlovables. Lenny speaks from his own experience as he nods his head in a momentary flashback:

"I found such a group in my own neighborhood. They just about LIVED in a local candy store. They had no other interest in life, no school, no job, nothing — just hanging around the candy store. I asked the community for help. A free meeting room was given me by the congregation of Beth Israel in their center at Remsen Ave. and Ave. A. The boys and I meet twice a week.

REMEDIAL MEASURES

"We discuss problems, personal and topical. My latest project has been the use of a tape recorder. The boys gripe into the microphone and then we play it back—to their amusement and profit. For they have had a chance to blow off steam, they have seen that others have similar problems and they can laugh at how serious they were about some crisis which suddenly does not appear to loom so big on their emotional horizon!"

The founder and athletic director of the Lenny Perlman A.C. doesn't pretend it's all a bed of roses. Of course there are problems in dealing with these youngsters but they are not irresolvable, given good will and effort on the part of the community.

The boys go to Tilden High School's gymnasium where Lenny and they "have it out" with other clubs and youth groups in the neighborhood. Instead of "rumbles" on the streets, they "fight it out" on the basketball court or in the boxing ring. Brass knuckles and switchblades are replaced by boxing gloves and swimming trunks.

What about Lenny Perlman's own plans and needs? "Well, if I talk about that at all, it's only because I know that it represents the plans and needs of many like myself. Right now, I am trying to raise some money so I can get to these boys and more like them. I have no city or civic group behind me, you know. I need these boys to have a permanent clubroom where they can spend their time under supervision of well-meaning adults. I want a place of their own for them so they feel they HAVE something, BELONG to something. Where they can get together for a meeting, a dance, some weight-lifting or ping-pong."

Of such seemingly minor needs can JD be diminished or even wiped out? "Well, I know this," he answers. A number of these boys who just a few months ago were considered as incorrigible have gone back to school. A few of them have gone to work and every last one of them has shown a better social awareness of their families and the community at large!"

How would he sum it all up, then?

"It is important," says this young idealist — this peculiarly significant combination of brain and brawn — "that the adult public be aware of the civic situations which confront them and their children. I don't believe that the public is yet fully aware of the fact that the city government has allowed its 'public helping' agencies to all but fall apart.

"I believe that there are a number of still unanswered questions which each individual citizen must ask himself. Such questions as: Why are school teachers paid so little that they have to be placed in the degrading position of having to take a second and even third job to support themselves and their families? Why are city social workers paid so little that many of them have to quit their jobs and few will enter the profession?

"Why is the city constantly cutting the budget at our detention houses and Rehabilitation of Offenders Agencies, so that psychiatrists and therapists have to be released for lack of funds? Why does the city encourage the flight from the libraries by trained personnel? These are all important questions and it is the right of the individual citizen to demand answers to them—RIGHT NOW!"

A Man With An Idea

He pauses for a moment, smiles at his own excitement but then, we said he was deadly serious, idealistic and determined.

He is a dedicated young man, this Lenny Perlman, as we see him. And there must be others like him, in every community, ready to take up the cudgels for the kids without roots. They must be helped somehow, both the kids and these young men who would lead them back to social usefulness.

Surely the richest city in the world can ill-afford to let the Lenny Perlmans of the five boroughs go unheard, unsupported! It will cost us more—each and every one of us has a share in this, you know — in later years. We must not allow our facilities — educational, social, rehabilitative and recreational — to deteriorate and wither into nothingness. The agencies are needed and needed, too, are dedicated young men like Brooklyn's Lenny Perlman.

As he said just before we took our leave: "'Remember, please, when a society can no longer provide for the individual, or take heed of his needs, then it is time to stop and think—just how far have we come from the days of the caveman?"

Lenny Perlman of Brooklyn can answer that, can you . . .?

Enclosed please find a newspaper story which discusses much of my work with youth and airs many of my views on JD.

Thank you for your consideration,

Parenthetically, Mr. Murrow, I wondered if an event that strikes at the end of the decade (and that might strike again in 1959) would come in 1949 to affect the decade then to come - and at sight of Russia's A bomb September, 1949, headline, I thought it had. More than anything else haven't the 50's seemed weighted with their bomb poised opposite the one we have? Yet, diminishing?

(And going back the other way to slower moving times than our own, before my perceptive time - 'maybe' the 1919 ratification of the 18th Amendment had the Big effect on the 1920's, in our Prohibition Era.)

Full apologies, as may be called for, Mr. Murrow. But with the limited reading all of us do, I had not seen or heard these dates and events grouped together, and thought in 1959 they might.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

We have been asked for our opinion.

Texas Senator Lyndon B. Johnson recently wrote to us requesting "reports and advice and suggestions from the folks at home." We have complied with the senator's request through a copy of the personal letter you will find enclosed.

Rather than encourage support "yea" or "nay" in behalf of specific bills and issues, we have attempted to clearly set forth our views in the form of an over-all political philosophy which we feel is applicable to any and all congressional legislation.

It is our purpose as voters and citizens to make these views known to others.

Senator Lyndon Johnson
Senate Office Building
Washington, D. C.

Dear Senator Johnson:

Your letter of June 11 to Mr. J. Walker Owens, Manager of the Chamber of Commerce of Odessa, Texas was referred to the Governmental Affairs Committee of the Odessa Chamber of Commerce for reply.

The Governmental Affairs Committee of the Odessa Chamber of Commerce is divided into a number of sub-committees for the purpose of studying governmental affairs on all levels. These sub-committees correspond generally with the committees of the United States Senate for the purpose of studying the national issues.

The members of our sub-committees study the various bills before Congress and make full and complete reports and recommendations to the Committee and to the Odessa Chamber of Commerce as a whole.

It is our purpose in this letter to give you the thinking of the Governmental Affairs Committee. It is the belief of the committee that any act passed by Congress dealing with the economy, rights and liberties of specific groups will affect all the people.

We have set out below our views from the sub-committees, classifying them on basis of principles rather than specific issues:

1. Taxes and Spending -- Taxes constitute a part of the cost of everything people buy; therefore, unnecessary taxes increase the cost of what we produce and sell to one another and foreign countries. The Congress in this session appears to have maintained and increased government spending to a degree greater than necessary. The committee questions the wisdom and constitutionality of much of this spending.

2. Social Security -- In our opinion, social security is actuarily unsound. The Congress will be forced to increase benefits, broaden coverage, and extend benefits as pressure is applied by pressure groups. We foresee, in the future, a tax rate of 20 percent of payroll. We believe this is unsound for the prosperity of the nation.

3. Post Office -- It is our recommendation that the Post Office Department be completely modernized, both from an operating standpoint and from the standpoint of financing. The Post Office operation should be confined to postal activities and not a lot of other "public service activities" as now is the case.

4. Power and Atomic Energy -- In our opinion, there should be no such thing in this country as public power. Those people who are recipients of cheap public power are living partially at the expense of others. Atomic energy should be placed in the hands of private enterprise as soon as is feasible. The government should not engage in business in competition with its citizens.

5. Natural Resources -- The Federal Government activities in connection with natural resources should be confined to natural resources found on Federal land and to recommendations for conservation on other lands.

6. Labor and Management -- The Federal Labor Laws, including Labor Management Laws and the Minimum Wage Laws, have done more harm than good in that they have created an inflationary spiral that will not end as long as these laws are on the books. They have caused us to price ourselves out of the world markets. As a result of these labor laws passed under the disguise of helping the wage earner or raising our standard of living, the Congress has passed farm subsidy legislation, business subsidy legislation, etc. in order to balance the scales. This can go on ad infinitum. The reason why we are having problems with importing of oil is because of high labor costs and high taxes. Congress needs to understand that the consumer ultimately pays all the costs. The Taft Hartley Law and it's predecessor have created unregulated monopolies and have permitted exploitations of labor by labor bosses in such a manner never before dreamed. The minimum wage law is based on false economic premises and does more harm than it could ever do good.

7. Housing -- The Federal Government's activities in connection with housing has created a very dangerous economic condition. The construction industry is practically at the mercy of Federal Bureaucrats and the Federal Congress. Public housing is particularly a one definable thing in the mind of this committee. As an example of how we operate, we submit a report from the housing sub-committee dealing with the subject of public housing.

8. Foreign Aid -- We could best render foreign aid by reducing our prices and making it possible for the people of other countries to buy what they need and want, thus we take ourselves out of the position of trying to buy their friendship, but earn it in dealing with them on a man-to-man basis. Foreign aid appears to be aid to certain industries in this country. For well over 100 years, other countries respected us because our citizens helped them help themselves. We have lost prestige in proportion to the foreign aid we have given.

9. Government Reorganization -- This committee believes that the recommendation of the first and second Hoover Committees reports should be adopted in toto.

10. Education and Insurance -- We believe, constitutionally, the Federal Government has no functional responsibilities in connection with education. It is strictly a local affair. There is no need for Federal insurance of any kind nor for any federal regulation of insurance.

11. Agriculture -- The sooner the farmer is freed from the purse strings and controls of the Federal Government, the sooner he will be self supporting and a dynamic source in our economy again. The Congress has almost made wards out of the farmer.

As evidence to support our sincerity, as well as proof that we bend not to political hypocrisy, we offer the following two examples of multi-million dollar undertakings without the aid of the Federal Government:

1. Colorado River Municipal Water District... the cooperation of three cities (Odessa, Big Spring and Snyder) has effectively solved the water problem at no federal expense. The water district was created by the State Legislature and resulted in the issuing of some $16,350,000 in revenue bonds for this project -- considerably less than the cost estimate made by the Bureau of Reclamation. The cost of this undertaking is being borne entirely by the users.

2. Odessa Petrochemical Complex...
   $32,000,000 represents the estimated investment necessary for the manufacturing of synthetic rubber. This is the first time such a fully integrated complex (including butadiene, styrene, and copolymer plants) has been brought about solely through private enterprise funds.

The foregoing will give you some idea of the philosophy of government held by this committee, and we believe a majority of people in this area.

This committee feels that the Congress would have all it could do if it would confine itself to the functions provided for it in the Constitution. History shows that the more concentrated economic controls become, the more inflation people have; therefore, we believe it's better for four to six million individual bosses making decisions that affect the economy of all of us, rather than a few over-worked senators and congressmen. We just don't believe that there are any groups of 534 people wise enough to legislate concerning the everyday activities of this nation. Every attempt to do so creates new problems which the congress attempts to solve with higher taxes, more spending and more bureaus. It is sincerely hoped that the foregoing will be of benefit to you and the people of Texas. We believe that if you will continue studying and thinking about the foregoing observations, you cannot help but come to the same conclusions. We hope that we have been of benefit to you in this matter and assure you that we will continue studying these problems.

Incidentally, we have an Action Sub-committee that publicizes in the newspapers, radio and television the reports and findings of this committee.

Respectfully yours,

Clint Lackey

AS SUBMITTED TO AND APPROVED BY THE ODESSA CHAMBER OF COMMERCE BOARD OF DIRECTORS, ON AUGUST 19, 1958.

PUBLIC HOUSING

Over 1.7 million people now live in more than 425,000 Federally-aided low-rental units. Some localities have added units of their own with state and city money which raises the total to 2.4 million people now living in some form of public housing.

Public housing was started in 1937 as a depression make-work measure.

This year it is planned to add 35,000 more Federally-aided units and once again a recession is being cited as a reason for building public housing on a broad scale.

The facts are that it will take at least from 6 to 12 months for work to start between the enactment of the law and actual ground breaking. Therefore, the immediate relief sought to overcome this recession will not be forthcoming in time to do the expected good.

When Public Housing was first presented to the tax payers it was represented as a method to provide rental assistance to families in the lowest income group. Many city planners recognized it as a weapon to overcome slum areas. Then the social planners recognized it as a socialogical merry-go-round. They theorized that the low income groups would be moved from the slums into clean new bright housing at minimum rentals. This would raise their morals and cleanliness standards and their desire for education and self betterment. Incomes would then rise and soon their incomes would exceed the maximum income allowed and they would then move to private housing and make room for other slum families.

There is one clear lesson we have learned from Public Housing namely, "It isn't buildings that make slums. It's people." If you move people from a slum to a new housing project they will create a new slum. In fact Public Housing has only shut the slums up within new brick and steel. The miseries of deprivation, the filth, and horrors are entombed behind these cold new walls. The new tenants have not been prepared to live in their new flats and the neighbors have not been prepared to receive the new tenants. Consequently the inevitable result has been chaos conflict, confusion, and resentment because they have been torn from their former surrounding and friends and have been herded into the Public Housing Unit where they are strange and have no friends at all.

Unmarried women with one to seven children, each with a different father, are living in these tax supported Public Housing Units and are collecting aid-to-dependent children checks from the Welfare Department. Therefore, we are supporting and advancing immorality with our tax money.

Vermin infestation is universal in nearly all Public Housing Units. In one recently built unit the cockroaches became so thick they clogged the motors in the tenants' refrigerators. Children are supposed to play in the play areas but many have developed the habit of playing with the automatic elevators. The result is that many people have to use the stairways. In fact many of the elevators smell so strongly of urine, from children that couldn't reach the bathrooms in their own flat in time, that they prefer to use the stairs.

Rowdy tenants use hammers to knock off the control buttons on automatic elevators. Vandalism and tenant damage is costing the Chicago Housing authority over $150,000.00 a year.

The most encouraging assistance which the Federal Government might offer to business in the United States would be to curtail its own activities in those fields of endeavor that could best be handled by private industry. Public Housing comes under this category.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Thinking about seeing you tonight on "Person to Person," I suddenly got an urge to write to you again - I hope you don't mind.

Almost every day at 5:45 p.m. I listen to your CBS radio newscast. The political news doesn't always "sink in" but I surely love to hear you talk. Your voice has the rare quality of being both fascinating and consoling. And on television, the added charm of your sense of humor and your "little boy" smile are good reasons why I never miss your programs if I can help it. (You're probably laughing right now!)

I realize how busy you must be and what a large amount of mail you must receive - so I was especially pleased to hear from you - and very thrilled. You were surely nice to reply.

All good wishes to you.

Is Man Progressing?

ARNOLD TOYNBEE
Our hopes and fears

Some 100 years ago Darwin's "Origin of Species" set out to explain the physical evolution of man. Since then science tended to confirm Darwin's main ideas. But can men be said to have progressed socially, morally, politically during those 100 years? What is the meaning of such "progress"?

To seek answers to these questions, The Chicago Sun-Times went to qualified Americans, presenting to them the replies given by notable Britons to the same queries put by the London Observer.

Today some of the British answers are given.

Next Sunday the Americans will speak with articles by Edward Weeks, Atlantic Monthly editor; Prof. Robert Redfield, the late great anthropologist in prophetic words written just before his death; Prof. Paul A. Schilpp of Northwestern University, president, the American Philosophical Assn.; and the University of Chicago historian, Prof. Daniel J. Boorstin, an authority on early America.

In this section are articles by famed British historian Arnold Toynbee, London anatomist and biologist John Zachary Young and physicist-novelist Sir Charles Snow, who begins his reply on Page 3 with the words: "Auschwitz and Hiroshima."

Do you believe mankind is progressing? What is meant by progress? Read these Anglo-American discussions and make up your own mind.

Historian Toynbee Views Dilemma Of Society

By Arnold Toynbee

LONDON—The creative acts by which progress —if there is progress—is brought about are the acts of individual human beings. When we attribute acts to nations, to governments, and, above all, to committees, we are abandoning reality for the realm of mythology or, at best, of legal fiction.

The case for giving individuals a free rein might seem to be overwhelming. Yet, give it, and at once you find that a few individuals get their scope at the cost of preventing all the rest from having a fair chance.

The inequalities of natural endowment and of social opportunity always work out unfairly for the majority if they are not artificially offset by some amount of social restraint. So, in the cause of justice for the majority of individuals, we have to clip every individual's wings.

THIS IS DONE TO SOME EXTENT even in the most individualistic societies. Otherwise, society could not exist; and, without society, man could not be human.

So does not progress lie in securing social justice for the many at the cost of curbing the few? But this comes close to subordinating human souls to human ant-heaps.

This issue has been tormenting humanity since civilization began. Today it is presenting itself in two acute forms: the issue between individual souls and the welfare state; and the issue between the relatively prosperous and free Western minority of the human race and all the rest of us.

Here the question "What is progress?" again arises. J. Z. Young tells us that man's never-quite-growing-up is one of the ways in which he has progressed beyond the nonhuman animals. Growing-up means getting hard; staying immature means retaining the capacity to adapt oneself to new situations.

Others claim that the welfare state's most heinous offense is that it is forcing adults to be infantile by depriving them of the chance to exercise responsibility.

PERHAPS THE SOLUTION of the apparent contradiction lies in asking what is the influence to which the soul is exposed.

If it is being played upon by a dictator, it is surely better, at one's peril, to be grown-up. If it is being called by God, like Samuel, or like the children to whom Jesus held out his arms, it is better to be childlike than to be a hard-set Pharisee. It seems desirable to be both childlike and grown-up at once.

Looking back over the vista of history let us ask: "What movement, in what direction, seems to have been most steadily desired, and most constantly pursued, by the greatest number of human beings over the greatest length of time?"

Chicago, 1958: Atomic raid drill at Morton High School.

Surely, man, so far, has put his treasure in cumulatively increasing his command over nonhuman nature. Technology, together with the scientific knowledge it requires, has been by far the most successful of man's achievements.

SUCCESS IN TECHNOLOGY implies success, to some extent, in another field as well: the field, not of man's action upon nonhuman nature, but his human relations with his fellow men. Technology does not require only the inventor's ingenuity and the mechanic's skill; it also requires agreement about objectives, and co-operation in pursuing them, between numbers of people. An isolated human being is technologically more helpless than a woodpecker or a spider.

So man's success in technology implies that he has had some success in the sphere of co-operation. Yet the co-operativeness that has sufficed to make the fortune of technology has been tragically inadequate for man's more pressing needs.

The tools with which technology has equipped him, and the surplus of food and commodities that it has enabled him to accumulate after satisfying his day-to-day wants—these have mostly, so far, been misspent on making war. And war is the most glaring of the penalties for the failure of human beings to agree.

MOREOVER, MOST OF THE residue that has not been spent on war has been monopolized, until our own day, by a privileged minority. Almost the only part or lot that the majority has received out of technology's surplus product has been the military equipment needed for making them into cannon fodder.

Today we are wide awake to the truth that advances in technology spell increases in the destructiveness of weapons. If a worldwide plebiscite were to be taken on the question whether technological progress is an unmixed blessing, there would certainly not be a unanimous answer in the affirmative.

We are aware that our progress in technology has so greatly outshot our achievements in the field of co-operation that we are in danger of starting a war that might make the surface of this planet uninhabitable.

Co-operation among ourselves is the field in which we most need to succeed, and it is also the one in which we have been the most unsuccessful. If a vote could undo all the technological advances of the last 300 years, many of us would cast that vote in order to safeguard the survival of the human race while we remain in our present state of social and moral backwardness.

WE ARE IN TWO MINDS; for if our fears of what technology may enable us to do are greater than they have ever been, so also are our hopes. We hope that technology may now have advanced far enough to be able to give the benefits of civilization to all men—so far, that is, as these benefits are in technology's gift.

The world now is divided between a pauper majority of the human race and a privileged minority.

The majority now believes that social justice has become attainable, and that a continued withholding of it has therefore become intolerable.

The minority fears that it may lose the freedom that is its most highly prized possession, and that the result may be, not freedom for the majority, but servitude for all.

Here is a dilemma that is making us rack our brains. Freedom is poisonous when it is a minority's monopoly; equality is unsatisfactory if it does not bring freedom with it; for LONDON—Auschwitz and Hiroshima. We have seen all that; in some of it we have acquiesced or helped. No wonder we are morally guilty.

Men like ourselves have done such things—and at the same time men like ourselves, sometimes the same men who have taken a hand in the horrors, have been showing more concern for the unlucky around them than has ever been shown by a large society in human history. That is the moral paradox in which we have to live.

IT IS WRONG TO TRY to domesticate the horrors. The mass slaughter of the concentration camps was both the most awful and the most degrading set of actions that men have done so far.

This set of actions was ordered and controlled by abnormally wicked men, if you like. But down the line, the orders were carried out by thousands of people like the rest of us, civil servants, soldiers, engineers, all brought up in an advanced Western and Christian society.

While it was people not like the rest of us but a great deal better, people who for imagination and morality, not to speak of intellect, stand among the finest of our race, people like Einstein, Niels Bohr and Franck, who got caught up in the tangle of events.

The dropping of those bombs was of a lesser order of wickedness from what was done at Auschwitz. But Western man ought not to forget that he did it; Eastern man won't.

AT THE SAME TIME we ought not to forget what there is to our credit. Some kinds of optimism about man's nature are dangerous—but so are some kinds of pessimism. Think of the care the Swedes and the Danes are taking of their old and poor, or of prisoners, or of social misfits.

Nothing like that has been done at any period or in any place until our lifetime. We can congratulate ourselves in this country, too. The Scandinavians have not made anything like a perfect society. In some ways we have not got as near to it as they have. But they have and we have made a better shot at it than anyone before us.

This country is a much fairer and a much kinder society than the one I was born into in 1905. It may seem sentimental to have consciences troubled about capital punishment, about removing one life when Western man has recently eliminated 20,000,000—yet it is a sign of moral sensitivity. So is the attempt, however grudging, to treat women as though they were equal human beings.

I HAVE NO DOUBT that in Scandinavia, this country, some, though not all, of the United States, and perhaps three or four other countries in the West, the amount of fairness, tolerance and effective kindness within the society would seem astonishing to any 19th century man.

It would also seem astonishing to any such man how much we know. And compared with our ancestors, there are some trivial physical differences. We are a good deal taller and heavier, we live much longer. But above all, we know more.

All this it would be reasonable to call progress, so long as we don't expect of progress more than it can give. In each of our individual lives there is, of course, something beyond human help.

Each of us has to live part of his life alone—and he has to die alone. That part of our experience is right outside of time and history, and progress has no meaning there.

In this sense, the individual condition is tragic. But that is no excuse for not doing our best with the social condition.

To think otherwise, to take refuge in facile despair, has been the characteristic intellectual treachery of our day. It is shoddy. We have to face the individual condition—for good and evil, for pettiness and the occasional dash of grandeur, we have to know what men are capable of—and then we can't contract out. For we are part, not only of the privileged North European-British-American enclave of progress, but of another progress which is altering the whole world.

SIR CHARLES SNOW

THE AUTHOR

Sir Charles Snow, 53, was for 20 years a fellow and tutor of Christ's College, Cambridge, in the physical sciences. At the same time he was a professional writer of novels and other books, primarily of a novel-sequence of 10 or more volumes under the general title "Strangers and Brothers," of which seven volumes have been published. For his wartime service as a Civil Service Commissioner (a position he still holds) in helping to recruit and organize scientific personnel, Snow was knighted.

I MEAN SOMETHING BRUTALLY SIMPLE. Most people in Asia still haven't enough to eat—but they have a bit more than before. Most people in Asia are still dying before their time (on the average, Indians live less than half as long as Englishmen)—but they are living longer than before.

Is that progress? This is not a subject to be superior or refined or ingenious about, and the answer is—of course it is.

It is because Western man has grown too far away from that element of progress that we can't get on terms with most of the human race. Through luck we got in first with the scientific-industrial revolution; as a result, our lives became, on the average, healthier, longer, more comfortable to an extent that had never been imagined; it doesn't become us to tell our Chinese and Indian friends that that kind of progress it not worth having.

THE CHINESE AND INDIANS WOULD like the chance of being well-fed enough to ask what is the point of it all. They are in search of what Leicester and Des Moines take for granted, food, extra years of life, modest comforts.

When they have got these things, they are willing to put up with a dash of American disappointment. And their determination to get these things is likely in the next 30 years to prove the strongest social force on earth.

Will they get them? Will the social condition everywhere reach within foreseeable time something like the standard of the privileged Western enclave? There is no technical reason why not. If it does, the level of moral kindness will go up in parallel.

THESE OUGHT TO BE realistic hopes. There seems only one fatality that might destroy them. That is, it goes without saying, an H-bomb war. That is the only method of committing the final disloyalty to the species.

No one can pretend that it is not possible. For myself, I think that it won't happen—even though we have seen how good and conscientious men have become responsible for horrors, even though two atomic bombs have been dropped already and by Western man. But I still think, partly as a guess, partly as a calculation, that we shall escape the H-bomb war—just as I think we shall escape the longer-term danger of Malthusian over-population.

Toynbee's Views On Progress

freedom certainly is the greatest prize in life, and a share-out that does not include it is bound to be disappointing.

However, we, the privileged minority, too easily forget that three-quarters of the human race are still short of food, clothes, and shelter. Till these elementary needs of theirs have been satisfied, the value of freedom will remain beyond their horizon.

TODAY IT LOOKS AS IF a majority of the human race were going to opt for progress in two desired directions: freedom from war and freedom from want.

Perhaps we may have to live through a chapter of history in which there will be fewer free men, but, if so, are we not likely to work through that stage? If, at that price, we do succeed in abolishing war and privilege, is not the regimentation needed to achieve these two aims likely afterwards to relax?

And is it really beyond the wit of man to get honey without being stung? Are all human activities so closely interwoven with each other that a loss of freedom in some fields is bound to bring the loss of it in all the rest? Or can we be unfree in, say, politics and economics without losing our freedom in, say, the creative arts and religion?

HISTORY SUGGESTS THAT THIS IS a possibility. German music and philosophy, Persian poetry, Chinese porcelain manufacture flowered under authoritarian regimes. Religion flowered under the Roman and Chinese empires, at the price of producing martyrs who baffled the political authorities.

But freedom remains a meaningless word until we know what it is freedom for. The most precious freedom is our freedom for creative art and for religious experience.

This is a sphere in which there is no such thing as progress.

A Six-Month Time Bomb

The uncompromisingly tough Berlin line enunciated by Premier Khrushchev is not softened by the sixth-month time limit that accompanied it. If he did not think that time was on his side, he would not have played his hand as he did.

What he has done is to put off until next May 27 a showdown with the West that could just as easily have come next week or next month. His reason for the postponement is not yet wholly clear, but it undoubtedly will be as time goes on.

In the opinion of Sun-Times columnist Walter Lippmann, who recently interviewed Khrushchev at some length, one of Russia's main objectives in the Berlin crisis is to make the West Germans more willing to deal with the East Germans.

Khrushchev's ultimate goal is a confederation of the two Germanies. For him to force a showdown on Berlin in the immediate future would not help such a cause at all, but probably would set it back hopelessly. By delaying the showdown, however, time would be gained for the East Germans to wage an intensive Soviet-directed campaign aimed at breaking down West German resistance to confederation.

Confederation—as opposed to reunification—would mean that each of the two Germanies would retain its own independent political and social system, and act jointly only on matters which affect them commonly, such as foreign policy. Khrushchev would be happy to settle for a neutral, demilitarized confederation of the two states.

As Lippmann has pointed out, more and more West German leaders, with the notable exception of Chancellor Adenauer, are giving up the idea of a reunified, integrated Germany. For one thing, the absorption of relatively poor East Germany would place a heavy strain on the West German economy. For another, it would create chaotic political changes and upset the delicate balance of religious forces that now exists in the West German republic.

A strategy of delay, such as Khrushchev has now adopted, is not likely of itself to weaken in any way the resolve of the United States, Britain and France not to be frightened out of Berlin by Kremlin tactics. But the strategy could have a deleterious effect on the West Germans in any number of ways.

While the West German government wants the Western allies to remain in Berlin, it realizes that for them to do so means that in one fashion or another the allies would have to do business with the East Germans. It would constitute some form of recognition of the puppet regime, even if no more than on the "agent" basis suggested by Sec. of State John Foster Dulles.

The West Germans might well conclude that if that is going to be the case, the better part of wisdom is for them to arrange a workable agreement for getting along with the East German puppet regime. Khrushchev could not seriously hope to see confederation achieved in six months, but he may feel that once any kind of a working accord is reached between the two Germanies confederation cannot be too far off.

In the light of Lippmann's early analysis of the Berlin crisis, Khrushchev's subsequent six-month reprieve makes considerable sense. In other words, Khrushchev may believe that the deadline he has set is just the catalytic agent needed to draw the two Germanies closer together on the basis of negotiations.

It is safe for anyone to assume that the more West Germany becomes worried about the future the more likely she is going to want to reach some rapprochement with East Germany. And the closer the two Germanies are drawn together the less tenable becomes the allied position in West Berlin.

In any event, there can be no doubt about the deadly seriousness of Russia's determination to pull out of East Berlin next May and turn it over to the East Germans. Khrushchev will not negotiate with the Western powers except on the question of their pulling out, too, to leave West Berlin a "free" city.

But rather than have the East Germans commit what would amount to aggression against the occupying powers, his real aim may be to force the West Germans into an accommodation with the East Germans that would leave the allies with little alternative except withdrawal. That is why this Berlin crisis is more critical than any that have gone on before.

A Lot Of Baloney

$175,000 For Brotherhood

Like most good things, good will and understanding among people is not completely spontaneous. Human nature being what it is, the differences between persons of various races, religions and nationalities often seem bigger than their similarities. Just as children must be taught race hate, adults must be taught brotherhood.

The job of education is one to which the National Conference of Christians and Jews has been dedicated for 30 years. It is a job that pays off in more harmonious communities and happier individuals. It pays off in dollars and cents, too.

Race prejudice costs Chicago alone $750,000,000 a year in lost purchasing power, says Edwin C. Berry, executive director of the Chicago Urban League. His figure may be high, but whatever it is money spent to combat prejudice is well spent, both from a material point of view and a humanitarian point of view.

The National Conference of Christians and Jews spends nearly $3,000,000 annually for the entire country. It invests in workshops and seminars to put across the story of tolerance. In Chicago, for example, money is spent to send policemen to meetings and conferences to learn about human relations.

The Chicago chapter is seeking $175,000 and is sponsoring a $100-a-plate fund-raising dinner at the Conrad Hilton Hotel Tuesday. It is NCCJ's only major fund-raising event in Chicago and deserves support from those who can afford to give. Let William V. Kahler, Illinois Bell Telephone Co. president and dinner chairman, tell why:

"The whole future of our nation depends on the furtherance of brotherhood. . . . Brotherhood is good business. . . . The greater the opportunities for all the people, the better the morale. Good morale helps progress and the economy. . . . Businessmen who do not participate in civic activities lose the satisfaction of worthwhile accomplishments. . . . I know of nothing more satisfying than helping others."

We can only add: "Amen, brother!"

OPINION OF THE PEOPLE

Ignominious Deed

As the anniversary of Pearl Harbor draws near it is fitting that we should pause and remember that the bombs that fell that day not only caused death, destruction and havoc, but contributed to a miscarriage of justice unequaled in the history of our country.

Under the influence of the military, our government removed the entire Japanese-American population of the West Coast into relocation centers further inland. Without due process of law these people were uprooted from their homes, separated from their means of livelihood and subjected to the most severe economic and mental hardships.

All this was based on the premise that our country would encounter grave military risks if they were allowed to remain. The lack of even one case of subversion and the brilliant record of Nisei GIs should make us bow our heads in shame. We should resolve that never again will the grip of war hysteria cause us to subvert our democratic heritage and deprive any minority the protection of the Constitution and the Bill of Rights.

William Gilbert

Mathematical Problem

In your Chicago Briefs of Nov. 22, Mrs. Margaret Scheel said she had a birthday problem and asked if anyone had a solution. Mrs. Scheel's problem seems to be as follows: When a child is born what are its chances of having a parent and grandparent with the same birthday.

Only an approximate answer may be had because our birth rate is higher at certain times of the year. We will not worry about the slim chance the child's parents may have a common birthday.

Now we can say a child has two chances in 365 to have a birthday the same as a parent and four chances in 365 as a grandparent.

To find the final odds we must multiply 2-365 times 4-365 which equals 8-133,225 or when rounded out about one chance in 16,000.

Robert Reardon

White Collar Unions

In your news columns in referring to raises for white collar employes in the government service they are mentioned as "non-union employes." This is not the case.

White collar employes within the governmental agencies have been organized and are continued to be organized at a rather rapid pace. In the City of Chicago, the Metropolitan Sanitary District, Board of Education, and other governmental agencies, large groups of white collar workers belong to unions. It is therefore incorrect to state they are non-union employes.

Most of the boards and the administrators of these governmental agencies have established an informal negotiating relationship with the local unions representing these white collar employes. It has been beneficial to all concerned. It makes for further assurance that the white collar employes will not continue to lag behind their blue collar brothers in good working conditions and wage benefits.

Golfing President

We are constantly reminded by various spokesmen of the perilous and turbulent times in which we live. Hence I burn up whenever I read that our President continues to play golf, sometimes two rounds a day. Why doesn't he join the touring golf pros and participate in the tournaments? Any money he won could go toward the national debt. In this way he would at least be a working President and not one on a perpetual vacation.

Venezuela At Crossroads

U.S. Has Big Stake As Voting Nears

Irving Pflaum of The Chicago Sun-Times attended Venezuela's Second National Convention of Journalists, marking that country's emergence from a decade of dictatorship. He interviewed presidential candidates and visited separated sectors of Venezuela, preparing this report.

By Irving Pflaum

CARACAS, Venezuela—It has been said of many countries that they were approaching a turning point in their history. Although this description often proved an exaggeration, it seems a sober statement of fact for Venezuela today.

Moreover, few countries in the world today have incorporated in their society as many American interests as Venezuela.

There are some 50,000 U.S. citizens in Venezuela, most engaged in exceedingly gainful employment. Upwards of $3 billion in American money went into the oilwells, mines, ports, pipelines, refineries, buildings and railways of Venezuela. The map alone explains why there is a U.S. military mission in this rich little land on the Northeastern tip of South America.

VENEZUELANS NEED BUT SHIFT slightly their political direction and the effect among Americans is measurable.

Standard Oil of New Jersey, for instance, or the U.S. Steel Corp., with major subsidiaries in Venezuela, can be shaken quite easily. The dividends from Standard's Creole Petroleum Corp. constitute a very substantial portion of Standard's net profits, and U.S. Steel's Orinoco Mining Co. also is a big moneymaker. Many other U.S. citizens and concerns are intimately concerned with the Venezuelan economy.

Western security still involves petroleum. With Suez and Venezuela in anti-Western hands, the squeeze quickly could become intolerable. It was Venezuelan oil which softened the blow after Egypt's Gamal Abdel Nasser blocked the Suez Canal, and greatly decreased the flow westwards of Middle Eastern oil.

The very presence in Venezuela, safely within the West, of vast oil reserves, still influences those who might hope to utilize Middle East reserves against the West. If Venezuela radically shifts politically, such hopes could rise suddenly and dangerously.

IT WAS IN VENEZUELA THAT Vice President Nixon suffered his greatest indignities. Anti-Yankee sentiment always exists in Latin America but if it again should rise violently to the surface, in an organized fashion, many U.S. citizens might be victims.

What is the situation in such a vital land, of its 6,000,000 inhabitants who trace their ancestry to Spain, Africa, the Aboriginal Indians and to scores of other places and people? These are the pertinent factors:

1 Some 10 months ago a 10-year tyranny collapsed with the fleeing of the dictator, his closest collaborators and his family, bearing their multimillion-dollar-fortunes to Miami and other foreign places.

2 On Dec. 7 the first national elections in a decade are scheduled. Until a constitutional government is established, the nation has a governing junta, a shifting group of individuals acceptable to major segments of the populace.

3 A pause in Venezuela's sharply rising economy has accompanied these events and two attempts to overthrow the junta made by military men after the fall of the dictator. A third attempt by army officers to overthrow the junta was reportedly foiled in mid-November. All were abortive largely because the people and leadership groupings opposed the "golpistas" (a violent overthrow of a Latin-American government is a "golpe").

4 The 10-year dictatorship left mainly untouched or even aggravated the country's poverty, ignorance and backwardness and seemingly more than doubled its Communists while developing the kind of passionate partisanship of which civil war is made. Responsible Venezuelans, recognizing all this, promoted a temporary "unity" among political groups.

An American oil worker is drenched with Venezuela's main product.

Sun-Times Chart

WHEN VENEZUELANS TALKED OF "unity" what they seemed to mean was a kind of quasi-truce among the politicians: a hushing of campaign oratory, the suppression of emotional topics, all within the framework of the election. One reason has been mentioned: A brutal police tyranny left so much hatred and revenge that civil war seemed likely; the people were to be soothed not aroused.

Another reason also exists: After the recent abortive military golpes, with some of their leaders now in exile and the dictator at liberty in Miami with his millions, the danger of a well-financed and planned revolt seems real and present. The constitutionalists therefore want to avoid offering pretexts for a military takeover.

Finally, with the dictator went most of his national policemen; and their successors are far from expert or ardent. Some hundreds of plain-clothesmen allegedly accompanied the crowds greeting Nixon. But they melted away when the stoning and spitting mob went into action. The absence of an efficient, adequate police force, leaving the army with comparatively greater power than ever, requires greater self-control from politicians; hence their emphasis on "unity."

Sophisticated Venezuelan politicians such as presidential candidate Romulo Betancourt openly oppose the notion of a popular front embracing the Communists, who obviously also are rejected by candidate Rafael Caldera who has Roman Catholic church backing. Yet "unity" has meant the absence of strong anticommunism.

Sun-Times Map

THE MUTED TONES OF THE three campaigners includes that of the Communists. But still their party line is easily discerned. It is naturally anti-U.S. and is reflected in newspaper columns and articles and in the attitude of many Venezuelans toward foreign Communists.

For instance, a man described as a Czechoslovak journalist and his companion described as an interpreter were invited by Venezuelan journalists to their recent post-dictatorship meeting. The wellknown fact that there is no freedom of expression for non-Communists in Prague, not only did not deter these Venezuelan advocates of freedom but never was mentioned in the resolutions they adopted, bemoaning the absence of freedom in some Latin-American countries and in Spain and Portugal.

Communist strength in the university's journalism school, in the journalists' association and among many leading intellectuals is alleged and seems likely. "Unity" has come to mean submission to Communist direction, which is, as reported above, subdued and itself seemingly dedicated to "unity." There is no evidence that this is more than a tactical departure from the party's line which has the approval of the Kremlin.

It is clear to many sophisticated Venezuelans that a real or pretended "Communist menace" would be invaluable to those fellow citizens and to foreigners who seek U.S. backing for another army golpe. So a portion of the "unity" advocated during the restoration of constitutional government in Venezuela is dictated by a need to keep U.S. officials there and in Washington relatively calm.

VENEZUELANS HAVE NOT FORGOTTEN President Eisenhower's outburst after the mob attack on the Nixons. His seeming readiness to send in the U.S. Marines jolted Latin Americans. In Venezuela it sharply alerted the politicians to the thinness of the ice on which they operate.

The dispatch of the marines would have unified Venezuelans even more than did the vulgarities of the last tyrant. It also could have brought death and destruction to Americans and their properties. Thus it would have replenished the grim harvests upon which Latin-American Communists thrive.

These prospects are seldom out of sight here. The bloody tragedy they would cause is something no responsible Venezuelan seeks. Hence the widespread agreement on "unity," on hushed campaigning, on muted anti-Yankeeism and anti-communism.

That such a situation presents an opportunity for Communist infiltration is self-evident. Equally self-evident, it would appear, is the greater opportunity which would be afforded the Communists by U.S. intervention against the current batch of politicians and the regime they are trying to establish.

The strongest possible effective antidote to anti-Yankeeism, is not another so-called anti-Communist army colonel, but politicians like Caldera, Betancourt and Adm. Wolfgang Larrazabel and the kind of parliamentary, constitutional government they are seeking. It is not a perfect opposition. It seems weak toward the Communists and golpistas alike. But no alternative is visible.

SUCH AN ELECTED GOVERNMENT, with or without "unity" only can begin, if fortunate in the selection of its personnel, to right some of the wrongs of Venezuela. Among these is the extra-special maldistribution of the nation's more than $4.7 billion in annual national income.

At least half the people are illiterate, and some have no prospects of an education. The rich are very rich, and the poor very poor. There is a growing middle class but mainly limited to Caracas and a few other urban centers.

The tremendous income from the oilfields and mines was used by the dictatorship for roads, housing, the university, public buildings and a variety of monstrosities from an $85,000,000 hotel atop a mountain peak to the officers' club with its four-story glass and marble dance hall fronting on a hillside covered by the shacks of the propertyless. Public education remains inadequate; more schools seem to have been closed for political reasons (students opposed the tyranny) than were opened, for any reason.

And while luxury hotels and clubs sprang up, not a swimming pool was built in Caracas for the middle class or the poor. A hospital finally was finished for 1,500 beds with less than 100 in use, because of the professional shortages and administrative snafus.

"War memorials" and parade grounds took precedence; graft, of course, was a prime motivating force in all public improvements. The dictator reportedly garnered $250,000,000 in rake-offs; no one is sure how much of this was paid by contractors into foreign banks, for his luxurious life in Miami.

MARCOS PEREZ JIMENEZ, the exiled dictator, was decorated by the U.S. government and received in Florida as an exile; according to sober Caracas officials he has been allowed to use his elaborate Miami mansion as the center of a conspiracy to discredit and unseat the junta here.

A batch of articles about the alleged instability and the procommunism of the junta here, appeared in Latin-American newspapers whose news columns are said to be for sale. Jimenez' loot is large enough to explain such articles. But local newspapermen, led by Communists, decided to blame them on North American news agencies, whose correspondents, reporting on events in Venezuela, seem accurate and fair.

Jimenez and his police state coincided with a sensational spurt in the Venezuelan economy, in part the product of the Suez Canal crisis. Oil production was around 500 barrels a day in 1940; it was up to 1,500 barrels in 1950 and nearly 3,000 barrels a day in 1957. Government income rose from $600,000,000 a year in 1950 to around $1.6 billion in 1957. Expenses, need it be said, kept pace.

NOW IN CARACAS are the experts and accountants of two Chicago business consultant management firms. They were hired to assess the costs of Venezuela's top-heavy bureaucracy with a view to its reduction. Larrazabel, recently resigned junta president, in talks with our group of foreign journalists, stressed the importance of reducing the number of bureaucrats in Caracas so more educated Venezuelans could be induced to live in underpopulated regions with great economic potential.

A former Chicagoan and an expert on government administration is acting as United Nations Point Four adviser to the junta's technicians. He is Herbert Emmerich, a former resident of the South Side who was director of the Public Administration Clearing House.

In 1957 (Jimenez departed in January, 1958) the government's income of $1,620,000,000 came largely from oil royalties (28.6 per cent) from new (now suspect) oil land concessions (21.1 per cent) and from income taxes paid by the oil and mining companies among others (22.4 per cent). Government expenses went mainly into public works, development, police and the armed forces. Education got 4.1 per cent, health services 5.1 per cent.

JIMENEZ BEQUEATHED TO VENEZUELA about $3 billion in debts to contractors, who no doubt had inflated their bids to pay off Jimenez, and to the bankers who bought their notes. Treasury reserves, however, remained high (over $700,000,000 in June 1957) until the books were examined by the junta. The estimated reserve went down to $300,000,000 in June, 1958.

But at the end of 1957, Venezuela held $1,400,000,000 in reserves abroad, making the bolivar one of the world's hardest currencies. Total monetary circulation in 1957 was about $1,400,000,000.

One of the reasons for the late spurt in income was the development by U.S. Steel of the Orinoco basin iron ore deposits. Iron production in Venezuela rose from 2,000,000 metric tons a year in 1953 to around 15,000,000 metric tons in 1957.

The Orinoco Mining Co. alone mined and sold 12,281,408 metric tons of high-grade iron ore in 1957, and the government received 86,282,578 bolivars from this U.S. Steel subsidary.

GALLUP POLL

Rockefeller Gains As Nixon Foe

By George Gallup

Director, American Institute of Public Opinion

PRINCETON, N.J.—Gov.-elect Nelson Rockefeller of New York looms as a formidable opponent of Vice President Nixon for the 1960 Republican presidential nomination.

In a "grass roots" appraisal of the relative popularity of the two men, the Gallup Poll finds these elements of strength behind the possible candidacy of the New York governor-elect:

1 As of now, with the nominating conventions still 21 months away, Rockefeller is almost as well known to both rank-and-file GOP voters and to Independent voters as is Nixon.

2 Although Nixon has the support of about half of Republican voters (51 per cent), Rockefeller today commands the support of about three out of 10 GOP voters (31 per cent).

3 Among the Independent voter group, Rockefeller today runs equal to Nixon in popularity as the 1960 GOP nominee.

Here is the way the Republican voters chose their candidates:

Nixon	51%
Rockefeller	31
Lodge	6
Stassen	4
Others	1
None of these, no opinion	7

Republicans were next asked:

"Suppose the choice for President in the Republican convention in 1960 narrows down to Richard Nixon and Nelson Rockefeller. Which one would you prefer?

Here's how Republicans lined up on Nixon vs. Rockefeller:

Nixon	57%
Rockefeller	36
Undecided	7

GREAT IDEAS FROM THE GREAT BOOKS

Dr. Adler Clarifies Child-Rearing Views

Dear Dr. Adler:

Many parents feel that they have been misled by the child-training theories of a decade ago, going easy on the rod for fear of thwarting the child's ego. The lack of respect for their elders and the irresponsible actions of many of our youth are the results of those ideas. What did the philosophers and educators of past generations have to say about parent-child relations? Could some of their ideas be applied today?

Sincerely,
Mrs. Sol Bassan
1439 Albion Av.
Chicago 26, Ill.

Dear Mrs. Bassan:

The great thinkers of the past have had a lot to say about how a family should be governed. Most of them approve the Biblical commandment to honor parents and repeat the warning not to spare the rod and spoil the child. There is little dissent from this teaching until very recent times. Practically all the great writers insist that parents should govern children firmly until they reach maturity.

DR. MORTIMER ADLER

This may seem undemocratic, as compared with our arrangements in adult society. Indeed, Aristotle, in his Politics, tells us that the father is the king of the family, ruling absolutely over his children; but he does not regard such absolute rule by the father as tyrannical, since it aims at the good of the child.

You may say that so far we have referred only to ancient writings which are weighted in favor of authoritarian views. What about the liberal thinkers? Well, let's see what John Locke has to say. Locke was the philosophic inspiration of liberal government in the English-speaking world. The phrases in our Declaration about equality and human rights derive from him. What does he have to say about the government of the family?

LOCKE DOES NOT APPEAL to the similarity between a father and a king, because he is against kings who try to govern grown men as a father should govern his children. But he does favor strong parental control. Unlike Aristotle, he believes that both father and mother should rule; only in case of disagreement, should the father alone decide.

Locke thinks that children are not equal to adults. They have to be "brought up" to such equality through their parents' care and discipline.

To inform the mind, and govern the actions of their yet ignorant nonage, till reason shall take its place and ease them of that trouble, is what the children want, and the parents are bound to. . . . [The child] has no understanding of his own to direct his will. . . He that understands for him must will for him too; he must prescribe to his will and regulate his actions, but when he comes to the estate that made his father a free man, the son is a free man too.

It would appear that Locke, like many present-day Americans, believes in "giving the kids what they want." But for him "want" means what they "lack" or "need," not what they think they should have. Children lack experience and understanding. It is the parents' duty to supply these needs.

Rousseau, another opponent of absolute monarchy and spokesman for human equality, is in basic agreement with Locke. The whole point for these thinkers is that the parents rule the child in order to fit him for adult freedom. Parental rule is tyrannical and unjust only when the parents are concerned with their own power and ease, or extend their rule beyond the period of adolescence.

WELL AND GOOD, YOU MAY SAY, but this is still before the flood of revelations bestowed on us by modern psychology. Doesn't Sigmund Freud say that parental rule causes all kinds of emotional ills in children? Yes and no. Freud is probably more aware than any other of the great writers of the tensions and conflicts that stem from the relations between parents and children. However, he recognizes that leniency and indulgence may have just as bad emotional effects as harshness and strictness.

The main problem in child care, as Freud described it, is to afford the child proper nurture and guidance without placing insuperable blocks on his road to adult freedom and independence. The child's "great task" is to free himself from his parents.

C. C. Philippe
VICE PRESIDENT

October 13th, 1958.

Dear Ed

I have been indicted by the Government for alleged understatement of my personal income arising from a difference of opinion as to the taxability of certain transactions, and I am advised by my counsel that the interpretation of the Government is in error.

I trust you will reserve your judgment until the matter has been adjudicated.

There is not very much more I can add to this except to say that the whole situation involves all my assistants and office and that I expect to win in court as my counsel, Judge Rifkind, equally feels certain.

The trial may not come up for several months and, in the meantime, it will, of course, be a difficult situation but that is the way life goes sometimes though it seems rather a pity.

Yours

C. C. PHILIPPE

P. S.:- I am enclosing a copy of the statements which I and my associate, Mr. Joseph P. Binns, have made to the Press.

I am innocent of this charge. I have never evaded the payment of my taxes. Because I have nothing to hide, I voluntarily appeared before the Grand Jury. At the trial I confidently expect to establish my innocence.

Joseph P. Binns, Executive Vice President of The Waldorf-Astoria Corporation, stated that he and his associates were deeply concerned over the action taken by the Federal Grand Jury in relation to C. C. Philippe's tax returns. He pointed out that Mr. Philippe had been employed by the hotel long before it was acquired by the Hilton Hotels Corporation.

Mr. Philippe was originally a protege of Lucius Boomer shortly after The Waldorf was opened on Park Avenue. He was trained by the famous "Oscar (Tschirsky) of The Waldorf" and succeeded him upon his retirement. For years Mr. Philippe has been acknowledged as an outstanding authority in the food and banquet management of luxury hotel operations.

Mr. Binns also called attention to the fact that the charges made against Mr. Philippe related to personal finances only; in nowise involved The Waldorf-Astoria; and if proved would not in any way affect the company. He stated that he and his associates had always had and still have every confidence in Mr. Philippe.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

This will acknowledge, with thanks, your letter of December 5, 1958. I deeply appreciate your taking the time to respond to my comments.

This time I am writing in a quasi-official capacity -- representing the eighteen law clerks here at the Court. Each day, we have lunch together in a room set aside for the purpose, and over the years there has developed a tradition of inviting interesting individuals to join us from time to time. Lunch is usually followed by an informal discussion lasting an hour or so. We try to select leaders from a number of fields of national interest. By way of illustration, our guests this year have included such persons as Dean Acheson, Dr. James R. Killian, Attorney General William P. Rogers, and George B. Johnson (newest appointee to the Civil Rights Commission), in addition to each of the nine Justices.

If you think you might enjoy dining with a group of "faceless miscreants," as we have been described by Westbrook Pegler, we would be most pleased to have you. While it is difficult to predict the exact course of any of these discussion sessions, I imagine that my colleagues will be interested mostly in asking you about some of the major foreign and domestic problems facing the federal government, and perhaps the role of radio and television in the development of an informed electorate.

Knowing that your schedule must be crowded, we seek no promise of an appearance on any specified date. We assume, however, that you must visit Washington occasionally, and since no special arrangements are necessary we would need no more than five or ten minutes' notice -- which could be provided by a phone call to me (EXecutive 3-1640, ext. 243) or to Mr. I. Michael Heyman (ext. 215), who clerks for the Chief Justice. Similarly, there is no set time limit on the invitation, except for the caveat that most of the clerks will be leaving town at the end of the present term of Court (tentatively planned for the latter part of June).

Dear Mr. Phillips:

I am truly grateful for your letter of November 25. If more people of your stature would bother to correct or criticize those of us who grind out words every night, our level of performance would improve. I am sending you the text of what I said and I think you will find that I was only half wrong in attempting to condense a very confusing story. But that, of course, is no excuse and is worse than being half safe.

I was certainly not conscious of attempting to convey by tone of voice or inflection a sense of disappointment, but you may well be right in your judgment there, too.

Please be assured that I am grateful for your candid comments and they will certainly be held in confidence. Incidentally, I am always much pleased to have my name linked with Sevareid's in either commendation or criticism. Thanks again for writing as you did.

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
Columbia Broadcasting System
New York City, N. Y.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

As a long-standing admirer of yours and of your various programs, I feel compelled to call your attention to what I believe to be an error of some magnitude on your radio news broadcast for the evening of November 24. If I heard correctly, you said that the Supreme Court had that day ruled that the Alabama School Placement Law was "constitutional" and, during a discussion of some of the facts of the case, said that after the four negro children had taken the battery of tests they had been denied admission to the school nearest their home (previously and still attended solely by white children), on the ground that they were not "psychologically" qualified.

The primary error in this is factual -- but on a point which seems to me to be of tremendous significance in evaluating the meaning and importance of the Supreme Court's decision. As the case stood before the District Court, and thus on appeal before the Supreme Court, the Birmingham Board of Education had taken no action whatsoever on the application for a transfer -- either by way of denial for any reason, or, of course, by way of admission. The complaint, which was filed a little more than two months after the tests had been taken, sought to enjoin the Board from "enforcing" the Placement Law on the ground that the Law was unconstitutional "on its face." The plaintiffs made no attempt to introduce evidence showing that the Law had even been applied to their children -- let alone applied in such a manner as to discriminate against them.

The District Court was thus faced with a drastically different case than would seem from your broadcast. The bald question presented to it was whether it could look through the words of the statute, which as you properly noted contains no reference to race or color, and, in the absence of any shred of concrete evidence, predict that it would be applied so as to constitute a subterfuge to prevent integration. The District Court apparently felt that due respect for "judicial self-restraint" called for a negative answer. The Supreme Court, I think properly, agreed.

This is not to say that the members of the special three-judge District Court, or indeed of theSupreme Court, were blind to what all of us as thinking individuals know to be true -- that the Alabama Law was fashioned with just such an end in mind. It just means that a court of law simply cannot act on the basis of such knowledge. If the day comes, as surely it must, when the Law is applied so as to deny negroes admission for "psychological" or any of the other enumerated reasons, and the persons thusly treated put on sufficient evidence to show that it was a cover-up for racial discrimination, the result may well be different than it was in the Shuttlesworth case. At least let us hope so.

In closing, let me say that I realize that this letter will probably not be sufficiently timely to be of value to you in your capacity as a newscaster. I thought I detected in your tone, however, what I hope was a sense of disappointment. If the Court had summarily disposed of a case raising the circumstances you described, I think you would be entirely justified in that feeling. Because of the tremendous admiration and respect I have developed for you over a period of years, I felt it necessary to let you know that such was not the case. In doing so, however, I must confess to an indiscretion. While I have written solely in my individual capacity, my official position is that of Law Clerk to Mr. Justice Clark. As such, it is considered highly improper to discuss cases with anyone outside the Court -- especially those in the field of mass communications. Were it anyone but you, or perhaps your colleague Eric Sevareid, I would not have. It nevertheless follows that I must respectfully request that you not disclose my identity or the fact of this communication in the event that you discuss the matter with anyone. I hardly need add that any views expressed in this letter are strictly my own, in so far as they are not supported by the record.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Our station has been awarded a grant-in-aid from the Educational Radio and Television Center to assist in the production of a radio series on "News in Twentieth Century America". Professors Kenneth Stewart and Leland Stowe, of the University of Michigan Journalism Department, will serve as our program consultants for the series.

We feel an informal interview with you on some of the topics referred to in the enclosed prospectus would be of particular value. Would you be willing to record such an interview, of approximately one-half hour duration? If so, would you be available sometime during the week of October 13-18 in New York for this purpose? If this time is not satisfactory, could you suggest an alternate date in October or November?

WUOM is an educational, non-commercial station owned by the University of Michigan. The series would be distributed on a non-commercial basis to the member stations of the National Association of Educational Broadcasters and then to interested commercial stations as a public service.

We would appreciate a reply at your earliest convenience.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Last week a small group of concerned people met at Saratoga Springs, N.Y., to discuss the present crisis in our country's foreign policy. After a discussion that went from Friday evening until Sunday noon, unanimity was reached on several propositions, including the following:

1. We have once more been brought close to war.

2. Our foreign policy is unable to cope with the real problems.

3. The basic assumptions of our foreign policy need to be revised.

4. There is need for wide public discussion of the issues.

The enclosed statement was drafted and we intend to publish it as a full page advertisement in the NEW YORK TIMES and in other leading newspapers across the country, depending on the amount of money we can raise.

The effectiveness of the advertisement will depend upon who signs it. We believe that you may share our convictions and we hope, if this is so, that you will join us as a signer. We do not plan to list institutional connections unless that is the wish of a particular signer regarding his own listing.

In coming to you we are not unmindful of the normal reluctance which most people feel about signing their names to public statements. We do not write this letter lightly, nor do we feel that this is just one more appeal. It may well be that unless wide public discussion can be stimulated quickly the next crisis may carry us beyond the point where solutions are possible, if, indeed, the present one does not.

It is not easy to undertake the responsibility of speaking out. But there are times when it is an obligation of citizenship to do so, and we believe that this is such a time. We shall be greatly strengthened and encouraged to have you standing with us in this effort.

If you are willing to add your name to ours, please wire or phone Clarence E. Pickett, Room 809, 1201 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia 7, Pa.; telephone Rittenhouse 6-9372.

(To be published as a full page advertisement in the NEW YORK TIMES)

America needs a new foreign policy.

- For twelve years the United States, under administrations of both political parties, has followed a policy of cold war. This policy has carried us time and again to the edge of disaster. Today, while still committed to an undefined and dubious mission on the beaches of Lebanon, we have once more been led to the brink of war over Quemoy and Matsu.

- War with modern weapons means total destruction and therefore offers no solution to anything.

- Though we are loaded with arms and have laid great store by the deterrent effect of threatened retaliation

  Communism has not been contained,

  Democracy has not been extended,

  A position of strength has not been achieved.

- We are in greater peril of annihilation than we were when the cold war started.

- The world's belief in the United States has been undermined.

- We find ourselves trapped in tight corners where we desperately assume rigid positions that make negotiation virtually impossible.

It is time we faced reality. Whether we like it or not, more than one-third of the earth's population is governed by communist regimes and there is no indication that this situation is going to change anytime soon.

We who join in signing this statement are unwilling to continue being dragged from one crisis to another.

We are unwilling to remain, along with the Russians and the Chinese, captives of cold war.

We are unwilling to sacrifice our country in pursuit of a policy which has been tried and failed.

We reject the dogma that humanity stops where the iron curtain begins.

We believe that a solution can be found.

THEREFORE WE URGE:

1. That the United States withdraw its support of present efforts to defend Quemoy and Matsu.

2. That, since the people of the world must either live together or die together, all the world be opened up, and that travel, trade, and cultural exchange be promoted among all peoples.

3. That the Government and the people of the United States, through every possible means, enter into a discussion and a reconsideration of our entire foreign policy.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Arthritis, one of the oldest of mankind's cripplers, has been attacked through research in an organized way only within the last ten years. Already, through the program of the Arthritis and Rheumatism Foundation, much has been learned about arthritis, and much is being done to ease the pain of the sufferer, and to bring back to usefulness some of those heretofore considered chronic invalids.

It would be heartening indeed if we could be assured at this time that we may count on your co-operation as Chairman of the TV and Radio Division for the 1958 Campaign.

I can assure you that the organization is so set up that a minimum of your time and effort will be required for the campaign.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

You may wonder why I send you this at your home address. The truth is, I have had a few sorry experiences in selling ideas, and while this one may be less "new" than I assume it to be, I feel better in avoiding a lot of office routing.

I've recently returned from Taiwan, where I spent a year living, working, and playing with the Chinese. I taught English at a Chinese university and learned enough Mandarin to get 'round the Island, eat well, and (best of all) level with my students. I had a month in Hong Kong and a week-end in Macao. And, on the boat from Hong Kong to Port Said I picked up a lot of stories from Britishers returning from the Mainland.

Question: What would CBS think of either of these as subjects for a radio documentary? --

"Taiwan: Its Mood, its People"

"The Chinese: Do You Know Them?"

The first, of course, would be fairly easy to pull together, from first-hand reports and with judicious grubbing.

The second is a more ambitious job -- especially if you think of the Chinese as they think of themselves -- possessors of the oldest continuous civilization in the world today. Even so, it's not impossible and could be brought up to date by giving more heed to Taiwan, over the past decade, than to the Mainland (though there are sources for this, too, as you know).

Dear Mrs. Pink:

As Mr. Murrow has already begun his travels, I am answering your letter of July 25 on his behalf. I regret to tell you that, as his plans stand at the moment, Mr. Murrow will be out of this country from the end of August until July of 1960. He will therefore be unable to speak at either of the meetings you mention.

My dear Mr. Murrow:

I am writing to ask you if you could possibly be guest speaker at one of our 1960 meetings - our first meeting will be on Wednesday, January 27th; the other meeting will be on Wednesday, April 27th. These are luncheon meetings.

As recipient of an honorary degree from Brandeis University last June, you may know something about our organization. We, the National Women's Committee (the "foster alumni" of Brandeis) have assumed the entire responsibility of the Brandeis Library - the new building was our enterprise; stacking the shelves with needed books, paying the library personnel, giving library scholarships - all fall within our special province. Our chapter is one of about 100 chapters throughout the country.

Should you find it possible to accept this invitation, I could almost guarantee that our membership of 4,000 women would attempt to turn out en masse (your name being the magic). We shall anxiously await word from you.

Meanwhile, let me tell you how very much you are being missed, both on radio and television. A year will seem like a terribly long time!

Sincerely yours,

Dear Mr. Pitchen:

Many thanks for your nice letter of June 13th. Your kind comments about my past programs are appreciated. It is always nice to hear from our audiences. In this way, we know whether or not we are presenting programs to please you.

Thanks, too, for your good wishes in connection with my upcoming sabbatical leave. I plan to be abroad most of the time. I hope that when I do return to my desk at CBS in one year, it will be with a program worthy enought to warrant your continued attention.

Dear Mr. Murrow -

I believe you are leaving the air soon for a long vacation.

I want to express my appreciation of your broadcasting over these many years. You have been a tower of strength - one of the few - in the struggle for truth, Charity & liberalism and democracy in our country. You have shown tremendous courage - and deserve the gratitude of your fellow citizens.

The strength of the forces which you have been combatting is shown by the unparalleled billingsgate ~~which~~ directed against you which I read ~~in~~ a last January when your leave of absence was announced. To arouse such antagonisms was a tribute to your high qualities & vision.

I hope you will have a good rest and relaxation (which you truly deserve) and when the time comes will be back again to help lead the country along right courses.

Dear Ed,

More people from more walks of life — people, that is, with widely different tastes in almost all matters — seem to me to have been more deeply moved by your presentation of Marion Anderson than any other program since you invented Gugleilmo Marconi ... or whatever in hell it is you've done. It was a great experience.

I've been mulling over a fear you expressed to me that "education will be just another American fad like mahjong and canasta." It strikes me as so true that it hurts. You were cogently seconded from London, as by no significant domestic opinion I've crossed. The Economist, you'll remember, commented that the U. S. "has swung abruptly away from its native anti-intellectualism and acquired overnight a kind of adolescent crush on scientists — the purer and more basic the scientist the better."

Various plans to "catch up in education" appear to be merely schemes to teach more-or-less the same things in more-or-less the same ways with the refinements of new audio-visual gadgetry on an accelorated basis. Whereas this may encourage more chemistry and physics majors and produce more technicians, it won't necessarily stimulate many of them to think or inspire the kind of creative inquisitiveness that characterizes scientific leadership.

Obviously, nothing can be done on commercial television to fill the vacuum left by an absence of genuine esteem in the American home for intellectual achievement. Certainly, no television campaign can whelp tens of thousands of gifted teachers. It seems to me, however, that an important key may be in your hands.

All this has been leading up to something you've probably already thought about: a junior "See It Now", televised early in the evening (say 7:30 or 8:00) on a weekly or bi-weekly basis. The idea has been gnawing at me since we heard Dr. Teller explain why Fermi chose to teach freshmen instead of a few select post-graduates. I'm not thinking of an educational program, as such, but something that will use your sense of touch to influence the climate of young opinion.

You said that every one with a problem brings it to your door. This isn't about to change, as long as it's conspicuously open. The four corporation presidents who suggested a program to you, then ran from it as too controversial when you invited them to anti up 30 G's apiece to finance it, would have a tougher time backing away from this one.

Mr. Edward R. Murrow -- 1 February 1958

My ideas on this subject are specific. There's no point in going into the specifics, though, unless you say the concept has at least a chemical trace of feasibility.

Dear Ed —

I discovered during a visit to the House of Commons today that your old and my current good friend, Sir Leslie Plummer, is about to pay a two month visit to United States. I believe that he will be travelling under the auspices of the English Speaking Union.

He mentioned that he would very much like to see you in New York and I volunteered to send you a note announcing his impending arrival.

I am sure that, as always, you will manage to find time to receive Dick. He has much to tell you, but what you have to tell him might be even more important.

We are all well, enduring a perfectly brutal winter, but expecting warm sunshine in more senses than one in the very near future.

"Canaveral - From the Cape to the Stars"
"As the Kremlin Sees a 'Conference'"
"One of Our Airplanes is Missing - Again"

FROM THE READER'S DIGEST

Here in the land of the "lox" and the countdown, missilemen are conquering new worlds by strange methods. Every time a flight fails, they move a step closer to success

Canaveral—
From the Cape to the Stars

ART TO COME

By Wolfgang Langewiesche

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla., where the space age is starting, is much like Kitty Hawk, N. C., where the air age started. Both are on the narrow "barrier beach" that—separated from the mainland by bays, lagoons and tidal marshes—forms most of the U. S. Atlantic coast.

To reach the Cape from the mainland, you drive on causeways across a lagoon, an island, another lagoon—for about a mile.

Long before you get there you see a dozen or so steel-structured towers. Through the sea haze it looks as if a bunch of lighthouses were standing around having an interminable talk. These are the "gantries" which raise the big rockets up to a standing position and surround them with scaffolding so men can work on them.

Here live machines of awesome possibilities. One thinks of the rocket mostly as a sort of long-distance artillery, but essentially the same machine can work as a satellite, a space probe, a moon ship, a space platform, a mail transporter and even, in the far distant future, as a super-high-speed airliner.

The Cape is the focal point of the American effort to make this new machine work; to make it work better than the Russians' machine. Canaveral is not where missiles are designed or built. That is done in the aircraft factories, mostly on the West Coast, or in the Army's arsenals in Alabama. Canaveral is where they bring the rockets to test-fly them over the range.

The "Atlantic Missile Range" extends from here 5000 miles southeastward to Ascension Island in the South Atlantic, halfway to Africa. Arching over open seas, high above altitudes at which airplanes travel, the flyway goes past a whole string of islands and countries; from these, U. S. radar observatories, mostly on foreign soil, look slantwise up at the flying missile and measure its exact course. There are also a dozen radar ships. The observatories are tied together by radio into one gigantic observation tool, of great precision. All these activities are directed from the Cape and all the observations flood back there.

The missile range is civilian operated, but is under Air Force supervision. Pan American World Airways, as contractor, runs the stations, hires and fires the men, owns and runs the ships, fuels the rockets, runs the liquid oxygen plant, and with RCA as subcontractor runs the radar and communications system. It is a very large operation. Merely to run one of those distant radar observatories takes about 200 men, with skills ranging from electronics to cooking.

Canaveral is not a town. There is no post office by that name. Nobody lives on the Cape except a lighthouse keeper. People only work there—perhaps 5000 of them.

Some 20 miles away from Canaveral, also on the beach, is Patrick Air Force Base. This is administrative headquarters for Canaveral and it does have a sort of town attached to it, composed of the usual dreary government-personnel housing and, strung out along the beach highway, a line of glamorous, high-priced motels with names like "The Satellite" and "The Vanguard."

The unofficial community center is the Starlite Motel. In its bar, underneath murals of moon scenes and space flight, you hear the special jargon of the missilemen. "Lox" is liquid oxygen. A missile is a "bird," a launching is a "shoot." The "beat-beat" and the "azuza" are radar-like devices for tracking the missile.

DUPLICATE

"Joe went down-range to try and recover the data can." "Down-range" is the blue island world toward the southeast. A "data can" is a small container, heavily insulated and crash-proofed, which rides in the nose cone of the missile and brings home additional information. "We had to destruct." If a missile goes out of control and heads for inhabited land, the safety officer pushes a button and the missile blows itself up.

For all the juicy talk, however, you get no information—because you're not supposed to. Security is strict, and more than that: few people at Canaveral are really in the know. The rocket art is already far beyond the understanding of most people, even the engineers. Most are supporters of supporters of the effort. But I did get some answers to questions that bother people.

Why are there so many failures? Our missiles never seem to go right. They blow up right on the launching pad. They go astray and have to be "destructed." They burn up in the air. They fall short of their supposed range. There's a whole new class of humor—Canaveral jokes—the point of which is that the thing won't go. Some of them are quite funny but they miss the real point.

The real point is that this is a test operation. Canaveral's product is not rockets, not even successful rocket flights, but simply information. They don't care whether the rocket goes or blows up. They want to know exactly how it blows up.

The failure rate is bound to be terrific for three reasons:

1. Once a missile works okay, they no longer fly it at Canaveral—they give it to the troops. Or, more probably, it is becoming obsolete by that time and they start testing a new design, again full of bugs.

2. Testing missiles is different from testing airplanes. With an airplane, you can bring the machine back and fix some trouble. With a missile, every test run ends in destruction, and every slight trouble makes a faulty run. You may know what the trouble was, but to fix it you have to work on a new machine; and on the new machine, some other part, something that worked okay on the first one, may give trouble. Result? Another batch of Canaveral jokes.

3. The complications of a big rocket are monstrous. Inside its deceptively simple shape it is full of the fiercest machinery yet devised by man. To get the lox and the fuel into the combustion chambers, for example, it has fuel pumps of fantastic capacity; they could empty a standard gas truck in five seconds. The flame that drives the rocket is hot enough to melt any ordinary metal. The little gyros of the rocket's guidance system spin at 40,000 r.p.m.; the electrical system has perhaps 100,000 soldered connections, and so on. To get a good flight, all this has to work perfectly at the same time. It is almost a mathematical certainty that the first flight will go wrong.

DUPLICATE

Why don't they do more testing on the ground? They can't. The "environment" in which the missile must work cannot be duplicated on earth—the emptiness of space, the intense cold, the weightlessness of free flight, the terrific acceleration while the rocket is blasting. For example, the flame that spews out the rocket's tail-nozzle takes one shape when you run the rocket motor on the test stand, a different shape when the rocket flies fast through air, still another shape in empty space. Will it burn part of the rocket? There is literally no way on earth to find out. You have to shoot it off and see what happens.

The same goes for vibrations caused by the rocket's internal machinery. You can run vibration tests on the ground; but then the clamps that hold the rocket down also damp the vibrations. So does the thick air that surrounds it. To find out what the vibrations will be in free flight in empty space, there is only one way: free flight in empty space.

The Germans saw more than 3000 of the V-2's go wrong before they ever got one to go right. Compared to that, we are economical. Now our failures are down from the thousands to the dozens.

To the Canaveral mind, these failures are not failures. They are discoveries. The way some people talk there, a successful flight would bore them. You learn nothing from that. It's the unexpected that's interesting! Sometimes this almost sounds like "double-think": "Failure is success."

I looked into this and found much truth in it. A flight of only a few seconds can produce valuable information. The missile is not only observed from the ground, by radar, beat-beat, azuza, etc.; it also reports, by radio, its own internal condition. This is a new art—telemetry, or measurement-at-a-distance.

The famous beeps of the Sputnik are an example. Each beep probably contained hundreds of separate messages, each message a figure. When a missile takes off from Cape Canaveral it carries perhaps 200 instruments which measure a temperature, a pressure, an angle, an r.p.m., a weight, a voltage. From each, a reading is transmitted several times per second back to the ground, and is recorded on magnetic tape. The principal product of Canaveral really is miles and miles of tape.

Sometimes, when something has gone wrong, the engineers make a "quick-look-analysis" of the tape and find the trouble right then and there. More normally the tape goes back to the missile's home factory, and a minute of flight may supply the grist for months of engineering analysis: just what went wrong? It's from the failures that the new art learns.

For example, one of the first Atlas missiles went out of control in full sight of everybody. It slued around to the right, then fishtailed to the left, flying crosswise through the air. Then it burned up in full view of most of the Florida east coast.

The failure was spectacular. It was also productive. The Atlas is of daring design. To keep the dead weight small, the superstructure is built of light sheet metal, held in shape by its own internal pressures, not by heavy framing. The mighty-looking shape is little more than a blimp! The fact that this Atlas nevertheless held together while flying crosswise through the air, showed it was still stronger than necessary, hence heavier. So Convair shaved several hundred more pounds off the Atlas. The effect was the same as if they had increased the rocket thrust by many thousands of pounds! "Success from failure."

Why do the Russians still do every space stunt first? People say, "Their Germans are better than our Germans." But the Russians' only secret formula is a five-year head start. They are ahead simply because they started pushing rocket development at the end of the war, while we attempted little for five years. In recent years, Americans have done much work on fundamentals and the results are now beginning to show up. But what it takes is systematic research, not spectacular stunts, like sputniks, voices from the sky, etc. We, the public, shouldn't demand such prestige stunts. They can waste time. We should let the missilemen get on with the main job of developing the new machines.

Most people judge the missile picture by three measures: how far you can shoot, how big a weight you can lift and how many missiles you've got. In case of war, these would be very important, and in these the Russians seem to be ahead. But other things are equally important:

Guidance: If your enemy needs nine shots, on the average, to hit a target, while you can hit yours with three, then one of your missiles equals three of his.

Miniaturization: It takes thousands of pounds of rocket to carry one pound of payload. To lift bigger weights, you can make rockets with more thrust. Or, you can do more work with less rocket—by making your missile's internal equipment ultrasmall and light. The first American satellite was much ridiculed because it was so small. Actually, this demonstrated advanced miniaturization.

Simplicity: Solid-fuel rockets, simpler and faster to fire, are now coming up. They have no fuel pump. Mechanically, they are almost as simple as the original skyrocket: just a hollow shape, filled with a fiercely burning jelly that shoots a flame out backward through a nozzle. They are lighter, more reliable, more easily handled by the troops.

All my time at Canaveral I was in a negative mood. Missiles are interesting, but you can't gloss over the dirty reality. They are machines for possible large-scale killing. I thought: Leadership of the world will go to the people with the most idea power and here we are engaged in a contest of killing power.

The space-travel possibilities are more appealing, of course, but as it has been said, "Why go to outer space when so much inner space remains to be explored?" I thought: People all over the world want America to show them how to be rich, how to be free, how to keep children from dying—matters which we understand very well. Instead, we are determined to show them the backside of the moon.

JUNE FINAL PROOF STORY 37 W-36

DUPLICATE

But one can change one's mind. I was on the Cape the night the first moon ship went up. It never made it. It fell back to earth after 33 hours and burned up in the air. But that didn't matter. I thought: Someone has said that the leading obsession of our Western civilization has been the idea of infinity, the conquest of infinity. What goes on here at the Cape is right along the main line of 1000 years of Western effort. We've been across the oceans and the poles. The air is conquered. Now for space.

Only VIP's get to see the launching from the "blockhouse." This is a concrete bunker, shaped like a turtle, a thousand feet or so from the launching site. It is blast-proof, in case the rocket blows up, and looks out on the missile only through periscopes, or by TV. During the last few minutes of the countdown, the firing crew ducks into the blockhouse. It is inside the control room here that the last valves are turned and the firing button pushed. The room is full of instruments: in them, the experts read the action. The action is real, yet abstract—as in the cockpit of an airplane flying blind.

Ordinary people are better off. The closest that outsiders get is a grandstand for the press about three miles from the launching pad. At that distance the rocket looks very small in size and shape—about like the Washington Monument seen from 20 miles away. But you can see it for real, with the naked eye. Floodlit, it is a white pillar in the night. The gantry has been rolled away on tracks, leaving the rocket standing alone, upright, destined for the stars. Nearby, a red light flashes once a second; it is a warning light for aircraft. It also shows time ticking away as the countdown proceeds.

The countdown is really a check list and timetable of all operations which have to be performed before the rocket can go. For this shot it has been in progress for 48 hours—not only here at the firing site, but all over the Atlantic Missile Range, perhaps all over the continent. Special airplanes fly far patrols to see that it is safe to shoot—no ships or aircraft will be hit. Other planes fly a high patrol to listen for possible radio interference. Circuits are tested, men alerted, radar warmed up, generators and stand-by power plants started.

Some of these tasks must be performed days ahead; others can be performed only in the last hours and minutes. The liquid oxygen, for example, starts boiling away as soon as it goes into the rocket tanks.

The press stand has a loudspeaker, and it keeps you informed of the progress of the countdown:

DUPLICATE

"T minus 38 minutes and counting."

"T minus 20 minutes, a short technical hold."

"We are resuming the count at T minus 20."

In the last seconds, the people on the press stand count out loud in a chorus, led by the red flasher. Just before the deadline, at T minus five seconds, a puff of smoke appears at the foot of the rocket and blanks out everything.

Then—5-4-3-2-1—nothing! You think it didn't go. It's burning up right on the landing pad.

But then, slowly, it pokes its head above the smoke. Slowly it rises—spectacularly slowly. The rocket is so burdened with fuel that it just hangs there, spewing flame. You think, "It's not making it—it will fall back!" You also think, "Why doesn't it fall over?" It is astounding how the autopilot keeps it standing straight up in the air during the first few seconds. Its sword-shaped flame flutters violently. It struggles.

But gradually the space ship gathers speed. It is burning fuel at the rate of perhaps 1000 pounds per second, and getting lighter every instant. Ten seconds after the first flash, it definitely gets going. The searchlight beams follow it, keep it white.

Now, after 15 seconds, comes the sound: an amazing voice, half distress, half defiance, as from a living thing. The flame that drives the rocket is intensely bright. At 1000 feet it lights up the sea and the beaches for miles around, and also the underside of the clouds. You expect in another few seconds the rocket will be swallowed by the clouds and the show will be over. Far from it. The rocket goes through the clouds, now lights up the cloud deck from above. Then the sound fades and the flame gradually becomes just points of light and goes out.

As I watched, I thought of what a Canaveral engineer said, one jubilant night, when his rocket had gone farther away from earth than any man-made thing had ever been before. He didn't mention Russia, or killing power, or national prestige, or rivalries between the Army and the Air Force.

He said, "We've gained a little on infinity."

ART TO COME

This condensation from a best-selling book tells what to expect—and what not to expect—from any meeting with the Soviet leaders

As the Kremlin Sees a "Conference"

Condensed from "What We Must Know About Communism"

Harry and Bonaro Overstreet

To the Communists, the delegates to a conference do not represent merely their nations. They represent one or the other party to the class struggle—a struggle which cannot be negotiated. According to Marxist-Leninist theory, there can be no peace until the capitalist class has been liquidated. Communists do not expect peace or even a lowering of tensions to result from a conference. To them high tension is the normal state of politics, and a conference table—even when called a peace table—is simply one more place where war is carried on.

It is enlightening to recall a speech which Lenin made, on December 21, 1920, to the Soviet Congress. Discussing plans for granting certain "concessions" to capitalists, he said, "It would be a great mistake to believe that a peaceful agreement about concessions is a peaceful agreement with capitalists. It is an agreement concerning war."

Communists negotiate not to seek a common basis for accord but to learn what they can from the enemy and about the enemy; and in the light of this, to get what they can in concessions or favorable agreements.

Here, again, we can go back to Lenin. In 1914 he undertook to analyze for the Party the difference between non-Bolshevik and correct Bolshevik behavior. It would be tactically necessary, again and again, he indicated, for the Party to enter into various forms of collaboration and agreement with outsiders. To safeguard the ideological purity of the Party, every Bolshevik must understand that the word "agreement" has a very different meaning when used by Bolsheviks and non-Bolsheviks. "For non-Party people, 'agreement' is the 'framing of a policy.' For Party people, an agreement is an effort to enlist others for the purpose of carrying out the Party policy."

Once we have absorbed this peculiar aspect of Leninist doctrine, we can see why, in negotiating with the Soviet Union, there can be no common search for a solution to common problems, no discussion in the Western sense of the word. For Communists to enter into a meeting of minds would be to fraternize with the enemy in the midst of war —and to risk coming under his influence.

"One of the most notable tactics of the Communits," said late Adm. C. Turner Joy, who tried for long months to negotiate a Korean armistice, "is to delay progress." Even when Western proposals are not really controversial, Soviet delegates are apt to begin with a negative reaction and then to introduce endless motions for modifications. By such delay, Admiral Joy explained, they "hope to exploit to their advantage the characteristic impatience of Western peoples, impatience to complete a task once it has begun. This is a shrewd practice, particularly as it applies to Americans. We are a people who like to get things done." By endless delaying tactics, the Communists expect that their free-world opponents will eventually make concessions in order to achieve a measure of progress.

We cannot ask our delegates to bring home a peaceful settlement of differences, nor can we ask them to guarantee that the Communists will live up to the treaties they sign. The Soviet empire rests on broken promises. During its 42 years of existence, the U.S.S.R. has set a world's record for breaking pacts.* Since 1917, it has entered into literally hundreds of agreements, large and small, and has kept almost none of them.

Why, then, negotiate at all? First, negotiation can serve an educative function on a world scale. The Communists continually pronounce their "peace-loving" eagerness to negotiate an end to the cold war. Only by finding out what specific, limited problems they are willing to negotiate can we judge the merit of their offers.

Second, the tedious, repetitive effort to negotiate with the U.S.S.R. has done more, perhaps, than any other one thing to convince the community of free nations that cold war is not peace. It has therefore made for the rediscovery and reaffirmation of common stakes.

Finally, every conference earns for the free world a further margin of time: and time is far kinder to freedom than to totalitarianism. Within the vastness of the Communist empire there are the millions of human beings who do not want to be there, who have never wanted to be there. The free world has not established outpost parties behind the Iron Curtain. Yet it has psychological outposts there: conquered peoples; minds that resist totalitarianism; minds that have been educated to a point where they begin to want stretching space. Time is not kind to "monolithic unity."

In negotiating—or bargaining—with the Communists, however, the free world has to be able to lead from strength. Nor is there danger that in doing so we will provoke the enemy to attack.

By reason of both their ideology and their Party discipline, Communists are less likely than others to go off half-cocked and create a crisis on impulse. No people have ever had less respect for spontaneity and impulse, or greater fear of the consequences that may follow from these. Moreover, their conviction that capitalism is doomed militates against their running risks when strength is not decisively on their side. Thus, paradoxically, their conviction that we are fated to pass from the stage of history becomes an asset to us. It gives maximum usefulness to the free world's every show of firmness and strength. In the queer topsy-turvy scheme of things which Communism has created, our show of strength does not bring on a crisis; it prevents one—and keeps the way as open as it can be kept for constructive bargaining.

Every free-world veteran of summit and pre-summit conference tables has learned this fact the hard way. We, to whom our delegates must look for understanding as they try, in the months and years ahead, to fashion some working approximation of peace out of successive limited agreements with the U.S.S.R., will do well to learn it also.

Down Beat

THE NEW music teacher at an Ontario boys' school had just organized a band, and the headmaster decided the band should make its debut before the bandmaster felt it was ready. So, on the big day, he tapped the music stand for attention and nervously hissed at his musicians, "If you don't feel sure of your part, just pretend to play."

Then he brought his baton down with a magnificent flourish—and the entire band gave fourth with a crashing silence. —Maclean's Magazine

An article a day of enduring significance, in condensed permanent booklet form

Has cold-blooded murder been committed along the Russian-Turkish border? Consider the evidence—

ONE OF OUR AIRPLANES IS MISSING—AGAIN

By Allen Rankin

EARLY LAST January, Russia's Deputy Premier Anastas I. Mikoyan, visiting Washington on his "good-will" tour, was pointedly queried about an event which has been much in the minds of U. S. high officials. Both Vice President Nixon and former Secretary of State Dulles pressed for an honest explanation. Like all Soviet spokesmen before him, Mikoyan denied any knowledge of it beyond what had already been reported. "Why," he asked testily, "are Americans so suspicious about this?"

Why, Mr. Mikoyan? Here is why. To suspect the Russians of a murderous practice, all anyone needs to do is look at the record.

At 10:21 a.m. on September 2, 1958, a four-engine C-130 U. S. Air Force transport plane lumbered into the air from the U. S. base at Adana, Turkey, and disappeared above the overcast. The plane, piloted by Capt. Paul E. Duncan, of Washington, D. C., was unarmed. On board were four other officers and 12 enlisted men. Their mission was to make a routine check of the behavior of radio beams and frequencies by which aircraft navigate over Turkey. For its job, the C-130 bore special electronic equipment.

At 11:42 Captain Duncan's plane was due over Trabzon—100 miles from the Russian border. The craft was at 25,500 feet but was invisible from the ground because of heavy clouds. Duncan had filed a flight plan saying he would fly to Trabzon, then make a right-hand turn and proceed parallel to the Russian frontier—but never closer to it than 100 miles—to the Turkish city of Van. Duncan's plane reported its position to the radio operators at Trabzon, and received a report on weather conditions.

"Roger," came the acknowledgment.

That was the last word the free world has heard from any of the U. S. transport's 17 crewmen.

After ten days of silence about the vanished plane, Soviet diplomats replied to U. S. inquiries. They finally announced that "the intruder" had "crashed" on Alagoz Mountain, 25 miles inside the border of wild and rugged Soviet Armenia. A formal Kremlin note said that the remains of bodies were found, "from which it is possible to assume that six members of the plane crew perished." There was no explanation of how the plane had crashed, or why. Despite repeated U. S. requests, not a word was forthcoming about the fate of the remaining 11 airmen.

Presumably Soviet authorities considered the matter closed when, on September 24, they deposited six crude coffins on the little bridge crossing the border-forming Araks River near Leninakan. The bodies were so shattered and torn from the crash that only four could be positively identified.

From the start, the U. S. Air Force doubted that this tragedy was a happenstance. True, a jet stream of wind had moved unexpectedly across Captain Duncan's course, and murky flying weather had offered few glimpses of the ground. But neither should have thrown an excellent instrument pilot such as Duncan far off course—certainly not the 120 miles off course where his plane came to grief.

Then, too, the event that had befallen Maj. L. W. Lyles and eight fellow American fliers scarcely two months earlier still made lively speculation. Lyles' C-118 transport had disappeared mysteriously on June 27 while making an ordinary cargo run on about the same course as Duncan's. Questioned the following day as to what they knew about this, the Soviets answered vaguely: Russian fighter planes had "forced the trespasser aircraft to land" near Lake Sevan, in Soviet Armenia; it had "burned"; the nine Americans were "detained."

Ten days later the nine U. S. airmen were released and told their own story. Major Lyles, somewhere between Adana and Trabzon, had been trying to get out of turbulent thunderstorms when suddenly he was fired on by two MIG fighters. He lowered his landing gear "in an attempt to indicate clearly that we were on a non-provocative flight." The Soviet fighters replied by sending Lyles' plane down in such a wrapper of flames that he and three others couldn't parachute out with the rest. Still, he managed to set the plane down on a half-finished runway—which turned out to be Russian—and the last four men jumped clear just before the craft exploded.

Officers aboard Lyles' ship suspected that something other than storms had brought them too close to the border. When they had come out of the thunderheads, the navigation beams seemed to be askew. Had Captain Duncan and crew met with a similar experience?

On September 8 a specially equipped U. S. test plane was sent over the exact route the lost C-130 had embarked on six days earlier. Its aim was to find out just why Captain Duncan had wandered so far off course.

As the craft approached Trabzon, the crew noticed something strange. The Morse Code identification signal coming from Trabzon tower, sounding "TZ . . . TZ . . . TZ . . ." in their earphones, was supposed to grow louder and stronger. Instead, it grew weaker, and a stronger signal from somewhere else began. There was Trabzon tower now, directly beneath them (they had been careful to choose a day with good visibility, so they could see ground points clearly), but what sounded like its signal was beckoning them on toward Russia!

The test crewmen smiled grimly. As they left Trabzon behind, the quivering needle of their radio direction finder (RDF) did not swing around and point back toward the Trabzon beacon, on which it was supposed to be homing. Instead, it kept pointing northeast, along the curving coast of the Black Sea, toward Russia. If this test crew had been flying "on instruments," as Captain Duncan had been, they might have headed right across the Soviet border! And into a Soviet trap?

Investigating further, the special crew flew as far as permitted up the coast of the Black Sea, to a point within sight of the border. With their sensitive instruments they determined that the intruding beams were coming from the vicinity of Batumi and Poti, Russian Black Sea cities. Both places are almost directly in line with the Turkish flight lane extending from Adana to Trabzon, and the radio signals blanketing Trabzon were only one kilocycle removed from the Trabzon frequency.

The Air Force team continued the test. Returning to Trabzon, they then "homed" their radio direction finder on the Turkish city of Van, which had been the intended destination of Captain Duncan's transport. Now even more powerful signals pulled their RDF needle toward Yerevan in Soviet Armenia, the area where Captain Duncan's plane was later found to have crashed. It was not until they came very close to Van that its friendly call—15 kilocycles different from Yerevan's but not nearly so powerful—could be heard clearly.

On November 13 U. S. Deputy Under Secretary of State Robert Murphy invited Soviet Ambassador Mikhail Menshikov and Soviet Air Attaché Maj. Gen. Mikhail N. Kostiouk to his State Department office. Once again he asked for "the facts" on the 11 missing airmen. Receiving no information, he went on to provide some. He told them it appeared likely that the plane's pilot had crossed the border unintentionally "as the result of signals transmitted by radio beacons" in the U.S.S.R. He charged that the transport had been deliberately shot down "as though it were an enemy aircraft" and "without regard for the rules of civilized international practice."

Menshikov questioned this. Whereupon Murphy offered to play a certain tape recording he thought might interest his guests. It was a record of conversation between Soviet pilots in what appeared to have been a rather one-sided battle. Ambassador Menshikov refused to listen to the recording. "I am not competent to assess it from a technical point of view," he said.

"That is the reason General Kostiouk has been invited to accompany the Ambassador on his call," said Murphy.

Menshikov declined again.

Had he listened, he would have heard the sounds of murder being committed in Soviet Armenian skies on September 2. For the back-and-forth talk and bursts of gunfire that accompanied the shooting down of the American transport had been monitored and recorded. Here are significant extracts:

First Russian pilot: "I see the target to the right."

Did You Realize That . . . ?

SINCE April 8, 1950, aircraft of the Soviet Union have, deliberately and without provocation, shot down eight American planes in locations ranging from Yuri Island, off Japan, to the Baltic Sea. They have forced two of our planes, under threat of destruction, to land in Russia and Hungary, and have attacked but failed to shoot down three other planes. At the moment, 35 American fliers, some or all of whom may have survived, are missing; many may be in Soviet prisons—although the Kremlin denies it.

Another: "I see the target, a large one. . . ."

A third, identifying himself by plane number: "I am 201. I see the target. Attack! I am 201. I am attacking the target!"

"Attack, attack, 218, attack!"

Jubilant voices, high-keyed with excitement. Over a period of 20 minutes they are heard as at least five fighters form up and then batter their unarmed victim. Further snatches complete the story:

"The target is a transport, four engined."

"Target speed is 300 [300 kilometers, about 180 m.p.h.]. I am going along with it. It is turning toward the fence [the border]."

"There's a hit!"

"The target is burning, 582."

"Open fire!"

"218, are you attacking?"

"Yes, yes, I . . ."

"The tail assembly is falling off the target."

"Look at him. He will not get away. He is already falling. . . ."

Then the shout of final victory: "Yes, he is falling. I will finish him off, boys. I will finish him off on the run."

Why wasn't the public told immediately about the recording that Murphy offered to play for the Soviet ambassador? The reason was simple. The State Department wanted to give the U.S.S.R. every opportunity to free the 11 missing fliers—if they were still alive—before diminishing this possibility by revealing the Soviet crime. Knowing that Mikoyan would soon be visiting the United States, our officials delayed in revealing the tape until they could make a final appeal to Russia's No.-2 man to tell us what had become of the C-130 airmen. The delay proved futile.

THERE IS nothing new—to certain fliers—about Soviet "decoy" radio signals. A U. S. Air Force pilot has told me: "As early as 1956, when I flew through Turkey, there was a notice, 'Beware of confusing radio signals.' We all knew whose signals were meant. Today every pilot who flies through the part of the world where the C-130 went astray is warned to watch his step, his dead reckoning and his radar."

"There's a name for this kind of thing in military parlance," an executive in the electronic industry informs me. "It's called 'spoofing.'"

The mildest thing that can be said about this kind of "spoofing" is that it's illegal. In every civilized country specific radio frequencies are assigned by law to specific stations. To operate them in such a way as to interfere with one's neighboring country is a direct violation of the International Telecommunication Convention of 1952, which Soviet Russia signed.

At best, interfering radio signals are criminally dangerous entanglements capable of tripping the most skillful pilots in bad weather. At worst, the Soviet kind amounts to cold-blooded murder—a calculated terrorism aimed at harassing airmen who fly free-world air routes near Soviet territory. What can be done about "incidents" that end with coffins or with the total disappearance of U. S. fliers?

For one thing, we can modernize free-world radio beacons in spots where they are being washed out by stronger Soviet transmissions. For another, we can urge the United Nations to insist upon international air-navigation laws with the teeth of enforcement in them. The laws of the sea, nearly as old as mankind, demand that one not only refrain from attacking his fellow mariner but assist any sailor he finds in distress. Maritime law is strictly enforced all over the globe; aviation law, less than 56 years old, has yet to enforce these civilities.

Our greatest hope, however, is that we can somehow get across to the Soviets that our nations cannot "get closer together," as Mikoyan proposed during his winter visit, as long as the U.S.S.R. extends one hand in apparent friendship and commits murder with the other. Only when this realization dawns on the Kremlin can we consider the devoutly-wished-for "thaw" in the cold war.

Dear Mr. Pollard:

I am much in your debt for your thoughtfulness in sending me your talk on "Three Kinds of Inflation". It is refreshing, and I might add unusual to find someone in the academic world who can make such matters intelligible to the layman.

I continue to feel that the mass media is attempting all too little in the way of simplifying without distorting major issues of the day.

Should you be discoursing upon similar subjects in the future, I shall be most grateful for a copy of your remarks.

Dear Ed Murrow:

It was a pleasure talking to you at The New School luncheon on Monday. I was particularly glad to know that you feel the subject of atomic radiation has by no means been exhausted for television presentation. I talked with other members of my organization about a proposed television program, and we were very excited about the possibility of at least trying to arouse some interest in such a show, which could be pegged to the July report of the U.N. Scientific Committee on the Effects of Atomic Radiation and also to the talks beginning in July in Geneva on methods of controlling nuclear tests.

I realized after we talked that your schedule would probably be so tight this week because of your impending vacation that it might be impossible to see you. However, as I indicated then, we do have a problem, and I thought that you might be able to give me some general idea as to how we might proceed with such a program.

Your secretary indicated on the telephone yesterday that you might be willing to give us some general advice based on questions that we put to you. Again, I realize how crowded your schedule is, but realizing your great interest in the subject, and, of course, remembering the excellent telvision show you did on the subject earlier this year, I thought that you might be willing to give us some general advice based on the attached questions.

I should very much appreciate any help you might be able to give us.

Subject Matter

1. Since there will be the report of the U.N. Radiation Committee and the Geneva talks on the control of nuclear tests during July, would it not be effective to try to present a program at this time?
2. Would a network be interested in just a general program, e.g., citizens' reactions to the nuclear age and the problems it poses?

Kind of Program

1. What is most effective presentation for a program that has to be put together hurriedly?
   (a) Panel discussion?
   What kind of people - Senators, private citizens, scientists, people who are known to be active for a cause, pro and con, or again should program be pegged on news story and as a result try to get some members of the U.N. Scientific Committee together?
   (b) Interview program?
   Again what kind of people? Is it necessary to have both pro and con?
   (c) Pictorial and narration? This would take a long time to put together, wouldn't it?

Who do we approach with an idea for a program? Is it best just to offer an idea and then let production staff take over from there? Or should complete program from start to finish be offered?

Is it likely that such a program might be network rather than just local? Is there any way to ensure network coverage?

Dear Mr. Murrow:

I have heard, through Mr. John Fisher of Washington, that you are going to do a documentary of Persia. That is the best of news. Persia is my business and I am sure that if you do a documentary, there will be a good many ambiguities, superficialities and contradictions in the general American view of Persia that will be cleared up.

You don't need any introduction to anybody anywhere in the world but, if you can think of any way in which I can be of help to you, I shall be only too glad. The Minister of the Court has been one of my intimate friends for thirty years and some valuable and humble people besides. Dear Mr. Murrow:-

This letter may make your wastebasket or you may tell your secretary to send me form letter # so and so.

Ever since you have been on the air with Person to Person I have been an ardent admirer. However the thought occured to me would not your public like to see how an average American whoses salary is in the $8000 to $15000 lives. As you know your sponsers who promote your broadcast receive their largestsales from this bracket of Americans.

Your person to person interviews are wonderful and it makes me feel good to see that the people you interviewww are regular Americans even though the free press prints punches which may not be all authentic.

I feel very close to CBS because I got my first job with the old and original Columbia PHonograph Co. I can well remember when Columbia first went in to the broadcasting game and our president at that time, Mr. Cox was worried about the expense because all was goingout and nothing coming in. Subsequently the broadcasting portion of Columbia was sold to Mr. Frank Stanton and I do not need to tell you where CBS has gone since then.

I have been inthe electronics game since 1921, the crystal set days and have a lot of friends in the industry. At the present time I am controller of a large electronic parts distribut here in Phila having 10 branches and doing an annual business in the millions. I can only say since 1921 the electronics industry has only just started and there is no sight as to what the future will be.

Dear Mr. Murrow,

I wonder if you would be good enough to agree to meet Mr. Peter Black, our television critic (and incidentally, the most distinguished name in this field, as you will have no difficulty in confirming), for the purpose of allowing him to interview you on the subject of television.

Television in Britain is becoming very controversial. Everybody seems to want to make it better. That is, to win bigger audiences for more serious programmes. What is needed is a popularizer, and this is the subject that Mr. Black would very much like to talk about with you.

I would be most grateful to you for your co-operation in this. May I suggest that you allow Mr. Black to take you out to lunch this Thursday, March 26, at 1 o'clock at the Monseigneur, because at that time of the day he is free from television watching commitments. An urgent reply would be appreciated.

Yours sincerely,

Mr. Edward R. Murrow

Dear Mr. Murrow:

I would very greatly like to place the enclosed challenge as a paid insertion in every newspaper and magazine in the United States. That would cost $ Millions; my means are limited to $ Hundreds. And so, I am using the U. S. mail to place this message directly into the hands of those who have the power and influence to do something about it. It goes, with my urgent and prayerful appeal for your cooperation, to each of the following:

The President of the United States
The Vice President of the United States
Members of the President's Cabinet
Justices of the U. S. Supreme Court and Appeals Court
Members of Congress - Senate and House
Governors, Lt. Governors, Attorneys General and Superintendents of Education of the 49 States
Mayors of more than 200 cities
A large number of newspapers, magazines
Columnists and Commentators - and Others

This is not intended as an attack on labor unions; it is not "a piece of politics"; it is the simple and direct effort of one individual citizen to point out just one phase of the hypocrisy which, in recent years and months, has taken over, and is fast consuming our government. Either we reverse our course and return to the principles of honor on which this nation was founded and has grown - or we say to the world that we are neither capable nor deserving of self government.

I am,

Sincerely yours,

A CHALLENGE . . .

To Those Who Would Crucify the South, and the Nation, on the Hideous Cross of Hypocrisy

Hypocrisy is not something new; it has been with us since time began. The only thing new about it is the extent to which it has been used in recent years and months by unprincipled politicians to ride piggy-back into high government offices.

The "piggy" is called Civil Rights.

It may be just a strange coincidence, or it may be, as an earlier and famous hypocrite might have said, "they planned it that way." By whatever devious mental and moral peregrinations arrived at, the fact remains that, almost without exception, those who are loudest in their pretentions on the subject of "Civil Rights," are the same ones who so loudly yell bloody murder at the mere mention of Right-to-Work laws!

The Ballot is sacred to the American people; and under no circumstances should it ever be denied to any lawful citizen who is qualified, both mentally and morally, to discharge the responsibility which goes with the privilege.

Sacred though it is, the Ballot is no effective substitute for meat on the table, or milk in the baby's bottle.

A man can live without a Ballot. But no man can live without food. No job (Right-to-Work)—no money; no money—no meat; no meat— no life. At that point we could throw out that part of the Constitution which speaks of, "Life, Liberty and Happiness".

What these Hypocrites are saying is, "Mr. Negro, we are for you 100%; we believe that you should have 'Civil Rights,' even if we have to pull down the pillars of the temple to accomplish it." But, what they really mean is: "it is our unshakeable belief that you should enjoy absolutely every 'Civil Right' which you are able and willing to purchase at the Initiation and Dues Window of the labor union!"

It is this Challenger's belief that they really have little, if any, love for the Negro; but, Oh, how they do love the Negro's vote! !

Four U. S. Senators have presented a Bill which proposes to make a Federal Offense of any bombing, or other damage to any house of worship or public school building; with proper penalties on conviction; with automatic, immediate and mandatory participation of all Federal Agencies in the search for and prosecution of the guilty party or parties.

At Henderson, North Carolina, the United Textile Workers, most definitely an interstate organization, have been out on Strike against the Harriet-Henderson Cotton Mills since November 1958. During this period there have been numerous bombings of occupied homes of non-strikers, and of mill buildings where men and women work and earn their livelihoods.

I have listened intently for the anguished outcry of horror and protest from the "anti-bombing quartet" of Senators. The silence has been deafening. If any one of them has uttered so much as one single syllable of condemnation of these goon attacks, it has escaped me entirely. (The same comment regarding the Perfect Circle, Kohler, and many other examples).

If these Senators would have me credit them with One Half of an Iota of simple honesty, I suggest that they immediately recall their Bill for the purpose of amending it; such amendment to be the simple addition of such atrocities as have occurred at Perfect Circle, Kohler and Harriet-Henderson Mills to their Bill, to receive the exact same Federal treatment, and subject to the same penalties as those presently set out in the Bill for the bombing or other damage to houses of Worship and public school buildings.

And there is the Committee on Government contracts —the real dyed-in-the-wool Old Pro of Hypocrisy. Heavily loaded with labor union officials, the people who regularly deny more Civil Rights(-to Work) to more people than all others combined, this Committee has the audacity to tell tax paying (and voting) citizens of the South that they can expect no government contracts for services or materials if they do not bow before the threats and become captive partners in this nefarious scheme to defraud the Negro of his vote.

This has been prepared, and is being mailed as an individual effort, at my own personal expense.

Cordially,

Charles O. Porter

Charles O. Porter
Member of Congress
4th District, Oregon

With my very brief tenure as head of the VA, I simply have not yet learned many of the details of our great agency's vast and complex programs, and it would be sheer pretense for me to make believe I had, especially in the presence of the men and women of this rehabilitation conference whose knowledge and experience is so far wider and finer than mine.

Besides the VA top experts, old friends of yours from many conferences and conventions, have answered with courtesy and detail and grace, your many and welcome questions.

If I cannot match these old hands and you in knowledge and in detail, I am sure that I can at least attempt to match the sense of devotion and dedication to the welfare of the veterans of America, their families, their parents, their wives or widows, their children or orphans. I follow in the tradition of several great Administrators, and I shall give my utmost living up to the high standards of care and quality they set.

I shall do all within my power to give the VA efficient operation, gracious and proper service to every veteran, to employ and promote the most capable and the most deserving people, to keep VA a service built upon the standards of proper help and sympathetic aid to veterans.

I shall do all I can to encourage the contributions in ideas and energy and imagination from our family of nearly 175,000 fellow workers. I shall do all I can to see that every veteran, however or wherever he comes to us, whatever his status, will receive the proper and gracious service to which he may be entitled.

I do not interpret this position as one in which my function is just to find ways to cut budgets. Cutting budgets is a very worthwhile endeavor, if it can be done without endangering the proper services to our veterans, but my mission as Administrator is far more positive than economy alone. The mission of the Administrator of Veterans Affairs is to use the facilities of this huge agency to find the answers to the great question: What is right and proper for the veterans of America and for this Nation as a whole? Are the programs in which we are engaged the best ones to answer the needs of the men who have put on the uniform of our land in time of war?

I shall do all within my power to strengthen the facilities of this agency in research and in long-range planning so that we can make sound recommendations to the President and to the Congress.

I shall do all within my power to support the magnificent army of fine people who work in the Veterans' Administration hospitals and domiciliaries—doctors, nurses, therapists, vocational counselors, and all the rest—men and women sympathetically dedicated to the cause of service to the veteran.

I shall do everything within my power to maintain the high standard of service in our hospitals spread from coast to coast. I shall do all within my power to see that the veterans in our hospitals receive a treatment and a care that is the finest in the world.

But more than that, I shall encourage and support the splendid research program to see if we cannot open broader frontiers of knowledge, find new answers, better cures, so that men will not remain bedridden if the miracles of medicine and research can find a way to prevent it. I shall do all within my power to combine the fabulous facilities at our command in the search for knowledge. Those facilities include the greatest medical program in the history of the world, the magic potential of such facilities as electronic data computers and the exciting actuarial statistics in the largest ordinary life insurance company on this planet where are found many answers involving mortality, involving life and involving death.

I shall do all within my power to encourage the dedicated scientists and research doctors who want to find an answer to the mysteries of affliction of the mind. I shall do all I can to see that no man stays a prisoner of mental illness behind hospital walls if human endeavor and imagination can prevent it or solve the complex problems involved.

I shall see to it that no veteran in this land ever receives second class medicine, but that every technique and service we can give will be mobilized to fulfill for these disabled veterans the promise of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. How can a man chained to a bed or room by mental illness or other disabling affliction really have liberty or be able to pursue happiness?—as guaranteed and promised to every man by America's earliest declaration of faith and of independence.

And more, I believe that the Veterans' Administration should be positive in its approach and dynamic in its programs, and that the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs should be a spokesman for these programs, before the committees of Congress and as adviser to the President of the United States in veterans' affairs. I believe that the role of the Veterans' Administration is not one of supine inactivity, but of action, of standing up and speaking out. In the executive branch of Government, the Veterans' Administration should be the agency charged with designing policies in matters related to veteran welfare.

I believe that the Veterans' Administration must remain the Veterans' Administration. Its functions should not and must not become splintered among a hundred other agencies—its programs dissipated and disappearing. What was it Winston Churchill said—it did not become Prime Minister "to preside over the dissolution of the British Empire?" Well, let me paraphrase a little—I did not become Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to preside over the dissolution of this great and dedicated agency.

I believe, as I am sure every American believes, that a grateful republic should maintain a sound compensation system, as it is presently constituted and as it was improved at the last session of Congress and signed into law by the President, to repay the war-disabled and his widow and his orphan for their sacrifice.

I believe further that the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs should continue to administer the part III pension program as a separate pension system under the Veterans' Administration, and that that program should not be moved or transferred to any other agency of government.

For years the Legion has been a great voice in veterans' affairs in America. It has clearly spoken its mind ever since the dramatic date of its birth in Paris, when young Teddy Roosevelt gathered together a group of men dedicated to the welfare of the veteran—ever since Watson Miller and John Thomas Taylor first stood in the Halls of Congress and spoke dramatically and eloquently in behalf of the veterans of America.

In every session of Congress since that time, the Legion has sent its capable representatives—men like Miles Kennedy—to speak for this great organization with its membership of 3 million men spread from border to border.

With public debate and with public vote, in the true democratic fashion, all viewpoints were expressed—and the veterans' benefits program which America has granted to the men who fought its wars, was hammered out upon the anvil of democracy.

These benefits, we believe, have been the most generous granted by any nation in the world to its veterans, and the veterans organizations have played a major role in their creation.

The officials of the Veterans' Administration—the Administrators of Veterans Affairs all the way back to the time when veterans' activities were handled by the old Bureau of War Risk Insurance—all have welcomed your views and your opinions. They all have recognized the sincerity of your devotion to the cause of the veteran.

In the tradition of the dedicated members of the Veterans' Administration family, and in the tradition of other Administrators, I, too, welcome your advice and your counsel as expressed in these splendid rehabilitation conferences. As you who have been visiting central office and my own office this week know, mine is an open door policy.

Out of this open discussion, and in the spirit of mutual confidence we always shall work together in common interest, for the welfare of the veteran and for the welfare of this great Nation, confident that a proper concern for our veterans is essential in times present, and times future, as it has been in times passed.

We have talked here largely in terms of veterans' benefits because that is the subject of this conference, but I am aware, too, that the interest of the veterans of America and of the veterans organizations is to do all within their power to strengthen America, to build and to protect it in the interest of all our citizens.

No group of men better understands the price of sacrifice, the size of the challenge in this world divided half slave and half free. No group better knows the need to keep our economy sound and strong and our defenses ready and powerful as we continue strongly to fight the peace.

I join you in that spirit of dedication—to strengthen and to preserve America and the freedoms for which it stands.

Latin American Elections

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES O. PORTER

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 24, 1958

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following portion of a broadcast of Edward R. Murrow of February 25, 1958, which pertains particularly to the recent elections in Argentina:

It may have come as something of a shock to this country that the first genuinely free election in Argentina in 30 years has produced a regime that is expected to be neutralist and mildly anti-American. Arturo Frondizi, who won a landslide victory, does not admit that he is anti-American and says he hopes to improve relations with Washington. But a large number of his followers are Fascists or Communists, and he told Joseph Newman, of the New York Herald Tribune, that the recognition of Red China, while not decided, will be taken under consideration. And during the election campaign he promised that the lives of Argentineans would not be compromised by any regional pact—meaning an agreement with the United States.

Argentina is a special case, and the result of an election there is not typical of all Latin America. But the result is startling, and it raises a legitimate question whether Washington's somewhat studied indifference to democratic liberalism in Latin America has not been carried dangerously far. The basic conditions that determine political results are changing in Latin America, and it may be that truly free elections will produce more governments that shy away from the leadership of the United States. The good-neighbor policy, which brought Latin American countries into close accord, no longer appears as paramount. The near unanimity of all the Americas in great international issues no longer exists.

One reason for this is the United States preoccupation with the needs of European, Middle Eastern, and Asian countries, which has led to a rising disinterest in the welfare of Latin America. Our influence has been waning for another reason, which is the too rigid insistence of Washington on keeping hands off domestic affairs below the border. We do not cultivate and encourage the personalities who hope to be the heirs of the reactionary or dictatorial regimes. This is a sound political principle if not carried too far. But we can have correct and even close relations with dictatorships, without throwing away our mass appeal as the great sponsor of political freedom and democracy. We should be making Latin Americans acutely aware that every step to extend democracy is sure of the sympathy of the United States. We have to be polite to the dictators but we do not have to ignore their opponents.

It can be argued that Latin America is not ripe for real working democracy, that the middle class is not large enough. It also is important not to rock the boat, as people keep saying, so that order is maintained and the production of raw materials can go on. But, if we get absorbed in conducting the cold war on the other side of the globe, we may find the cold war is being brought to our own back yard, and that we are strangely incapable of dealing with it.

Arturo Frondizi owes his great victory to a crazy-quilt coalition. Probably his largest single block of votes came from the followers of Peron. Then he had the backing of Communists, near-Communists, splinter Fascist factions, rightwing nationalists, leftist democrats, and some socialists. He campaigned pretty much as a nationalist demagog, making glowing promises of labor benefits, offering a combination of socialism and ultranationalism and the penalization of the rich. Now that he is in, he says he is committed to nobody and will govern for the good of all. But, however moderate his personal inclinations, he is under binding obligations to those who elected him. And to satisfy many of his followers he must be friendly with the Soviet world simply to prove that he is not a tool of the United States.

He is pledged to make the Peron party legal. Whether he will allow Peron, himself, to return remains to be seen. Quite possibly not, for the army is pledged to prevent it at any cost. If Peron were in the least addicted to democracy, this veto by the army would be distinctly antidemocratic. But now the army is a shield behind which democracy of a sort will have a trial. Frondizi promises to be constitutional and establish a rule of law. If he succeeds without losing his antidemocratic supporters it will be quite a feat. And to do so, it seems that he will have to be more anti- than pro-American. So for the present, at least, we do not stand to gain much. * * * Our policy in Latin America has not been actively to inspire the spread of democracy. This does not quite jibe with Herman Melville's observation on the subject of America and democracy. "We Americans," he said, "are peculiar chosen people * * * the Israel of our times. We bear the ark of the liberties of the world."

Goodnight and good luck.

Dirksen-Reuther Debate

OF

HON. ROBERT H. MICHEL

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 24, 1958

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, it is always refreshing to see a colleague place principles above what we often hear referred to as good politics. It is for this reason that I wish to compliment Senator EVERETT MCKINLEY DIRKSEN for his remarks which he made during recent hearings of the Antitrust and Monopoly Subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee. The Senator from Illinois who previously represented the congressional district which I now serve, called to the attention of his fellow committee members, Walter Reuther's poor attempt to twist the facts and juggle statistics to suit his own advantage. It is especially heartening to note Senator DIRKSEN's stand, inasmuch as it is obvious there are some who feel that any remarks directed against Mr. Reuther are similar to attacking some deity.

Furthermore I wish to compliment such industries as the Black Diamond Co. for taking an active interest in current events and for publishing a newspaper in which to share its views with the public. I do sincerely feel their views concerning the Dirksen-Reuther debate are shared by a great many more Congressmen and interested citizens than by those who support Reuther, and I am sure the public will soon come to realize this.

As we enter another election year, it might be well to remember that the public is becoming better informed with each passing day. It is recalled that the McClellan committee, in the past year, struck oil while drilling into the operations of Beck and Hoffa of the teamsters' union, and very creditably exposed teamster malpractices and misuse of funds in that union's treasury. If the committee insists on obtaining all the facts, as did Senator DIRKSEN, undoubtedly some interesting disclosures will be made when the UAW boss is called to the stand to testify.

Mr. Speaker, under permission to revise and extend my remarks, I insert at this point the following article from the Black Diamond entitled "Dirksen-Reuther Debate":

DIRKSEN-REUTHER DEBATE

A spirited clash between United States Senator E. M. DIRKSEN and Walter Reuther, president of AFL–CIO, United Automobile Workers, last week proved that the venerable Senator from Illinois had the intestinal fortitude to clash openly with the czar of one of the most powerful unions in the country. The occasion was Reuther's appearance before the Senate Antitrust and Monopoly Committee.

Reuther accused Senator DIRKSEN of rehashing an old General Motors slogan as DIRKSEN cross-examined the labor chief after 2 days of testimony on the demands the union plans to make on the automobile industry this year.

"But you have a right to represent General Motors here," Reuther said.

"You might in good grace withdraw that remark," Senator DIRKSEN said "I've tried to treat you as a gentleman. But if you must take off the gloves, we will."

Subcommittee Chairman ESTES KEFAUVER, who up to this time had been giving Reuther a free rein, came to the defense of senatorial dignity.

"Senator DIRKSEN is not here representing General Motors," KEFAUVER said, "But he may represent some of their viewpoints."

"That's what I meant," Reuther said meekly, as he grudgingly offered a retraction.

In Senator DIRKSEN's 2-hour questioning, he said he had developed real doubt about the statistics Reuther had poured in the record to bolster his arguments for a profit-sharing plan, cuts in automobile prices, and creation of a Federal agency to review price increases proposed by large corporations.

Senator DIRKSEN recalled that 3 years ago, Reuther had told the House Agriculture Committee that even if dairy farmers got their feed grains free, milk prices could be cut only 1 cent a quart. But Agriculture Department figures showed feed grains represent 5 cents in the price of a quart of milk, Senator DIRKSEN said.

"So I'm wondering about the figures you've thrown at this committee the last 2 days."

Another dispute over figures came when Senator DIRKSEN quoted United States Chamber of Commerce statistics on corporate profits which were at variance with some used by Reuther.

"You can do all kinds of sleight of hand with figures," Reuther remarked.

"The juggling can be done on both sides of the table," Senator DIRKSEN countered.

Senator DIRKSEN also recalled that in 1945 when Reuther's union challenged General Motors to open its books to prove a $100 cut in automobile prices was not feasible, Reuther was quoted as saying the demand was "merely a public relations job to put the company on the spot."

That was when Reuther accused Senator DIRKSEN of "rehashing an old General Motors slogan."

This is an election year and many Representatives in Washington are definitely reluctant to question the views of the heads of any labor organization, no matter how radical or socialistic these views are. When an exception to the rule comes to light we believe the individual should be commended for his courage and the incident should be given wide publicity with the hope his example will be followed by more timid officeholders fearful of their political future.

Thank you so much for your letter. Sad to relate, the brief must have gone astray for it hasn't arrived here yet. If you have another, I think Mr. Murrow would very much like to have it. If Mr. Porter says this is must reading, then must reading it is! Perhaps it would be a good idea to send the brief addressed to me in Mr. Murrow's office, and then there would be less likelihood of it getting mixed up in fan mail etc. Sorry to be such a nuisance!

Dear Ed:

I see by the public prints that you and a group of adventurous gentlemen have gone into the paint business. I am certain that you recognize that there is a new bi-partisan, untapped market in this town for a high quality Grade A whitewash which will be needed in increasing quantities as we go into 1960. Do you have a distributorship available in this territory on an exclusive basis?

As to your threat to sue my wife, I showed her our correspondence for the first time last night and I found out at least part of the meaning of the phrase "a furious Puritan". I found out what "furious" means. She claims I misquoted her and what she really said was "What I admire about him is his 'ferocious puritanism'" -- meaning, it was explained, "self-inflicted working habits of high discipline, the requirement of quality standards in one's self and others"and all that kind of stuff. I responded by saying that I did not think she meant that you would never take a drink or indulge in other pastimes.

Nonetheless, if you persist in bringing an action, I feel it only fair to warn you that my partner Thurman Arnold will be retained for the defendant. Just to acquaint you with the quality of his work, I am enclosing a brief which seriously is must reading.

The background of this brief is -- After "Peyton Place", the Vermont legislature amended its Criminal Code and included an obscenity provision. The Attorney General in Vermont indicted a news vendor in Woodstock, the locale of "Peyton Place", for distributing allegedly obscene magazines including that cultural gem "Play Boy".

Thurman Arnold wheels into the scene, convinces the trial judge that the case should not go to the jury but be certified to the Vermont Supreme Court on the underlying constitutional questions. This brief has just been filed with the Vermont court. When Thurman showed me a draft, I was so enchanted that I had extra copies printed for limited circulation.

I am certain you will find it worth spending a few minutes reading as both a source of enlightenment and entertainment. Also, if you are going to spend your sabbatical doing some writing, it might serve as a useful guide in telling you how far you can go.

Looking forward to seeing you soon.

Sincerely,

Paul

Be good enough to advise your wife that I have retained counsel in purpose to fil suit as a result of her allegations that I am "a furious Puritan". I shall bring this action as soon as I find out what the phrase means.

I must try to remain upright on this treadmill until July 1, but between now and then I shall spend a little time in your fair city.

It is needful that I should acquire a small amount of money to finance my year's leave, and I can think of no more painless way of acquiring it than from you on the golf course. I shall give you ample warning.

Reading Jack Gould's article about you at breakfast, my wife said, inter alia:

(1) Ed Murrow owes nobody anything, particularly television and the networks; he has given much more than whatever he has received;

(2) Ed Murrow would have been a significant and vital person in whatever age he lived or in whatever media he worked;

(3) Ed Murrow is a furious Puritan (whatever the hell that means);

(4) Ed Murrow like Clark Gable can always return if he wants to and be welcome. (I hope that puts you in your proper age bracket.)

There was much more but I said shut-up, he's married and I'm married to you and besides I am sorry he's going to start loafing because Murrow is the only guy in America that I am certain in advance I can lick on the golf course and this new leisure may give him an undeserved opportunity to learn for the first time something about the basic fundamentals of the game.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

I would like to advise you that a very distinguished gentleman from Thailand is presently in the United States and will be spending the next month in New York City and vicinity. He is M. R. Kukrit Pramoj. I am enclosing a short biographical sketch which will give you pertinent information about him. I believe that he will be staying at the University Club in New York. It occurred to me that you might wish to use him on one of your programs sometime within the next month. You will find that he has excellent command of English. He is a man extremely well-informed about the Southeast Asia region and has very decided views on the roll that the United States is playing and should play in Southeast Asia. I believe you would find him a challenging person to have on one of your programs.

Very truly yours,

Willis P. Porter

Dear Mr. Murrow,

I am writing this letter on behalf of our house, Donnelly-Mc Loed, in Pioneer Hall on the campus of the University of Minnesota. We plan to build a high fidelity system for our house commons room. We feel that such a system will be very much enjoyed during our study breaks and also on week ends.

Unfortunately, after taking up a collection from the house residents of which only one did not contribute, we find that we are still unable to purchase the kits we need to complete our system. The boys feel that they can not donate any more because they have to save for the remaining two quarters.

We are writing you because we feel that you are interested in education today and the future men of America; and you, along with some of your intellectual friends may have an idea to help us obtain some capital to help us purchase the remaining kits. We would certainly appreciate either an idea or some purchasing funds if you and your friends could obtain some for us. Thank you very much.

Sincerely yours,
Residents of Donnelly-Mc Loed

Mr. POTTER. Mr. President, an ambassador extraordinary recently returned to the United States from Asia, after traveling 35,000 miles, stopping in 12 countries from the 38th parallel to the Equator.

Those parts of the world are still echoing with the music of her voice.

She is Marian Anderson, and I take this occasion to thank her for the people of Michigan and the United States, and to welcome her back.

The lady from Philadelphia had only one line of briefing from the State Department before she left on her tour. She was asked to be herself—to be Marian Anderson. And that was enough.

Her triumph, sensational and well deserved, was described in an outstanding television broadcast by the Columbia Broadcasting System. The program was produced by Edward R. Murrow and Fred W. Friendly and took the fortunate persons who viewed it through Asia with Marian Anderson. The script opened with a statement that the program was dedicated to the children of Asia and to the great singer's mother—Mrs. Anna Delilah Anderson of Philadelphia.

Mr. President, if space permitted I should like to include in the RECORD the entire CBS television script. Since it is rather lengthy, I shall comment on its principal sections, including certain portions of it as a I proceed with my remarks.

The genius of the world, the great natural gifts of the world, are given by a God who has no consideration for wealth or skin pigment or previous condition of family or servitude. Today the whole world is taking firmer steps in the direction of greater opportunity for all human beings. The eastern world, in the process of throwing off the yoke of colonialism, is simmering with hope, demands and dreams; with renewed pride of race and cultural heritage.

Each country yearns for the privileges of modern living achieved within the framework of its own individuality as a nation, within its own nationalism. Each country wants its leaders, artists, scientists, and other men of great achievement to be recognized by the rest of the world. It wants to take its own honored and rightful place in the family or community of nations.

Most of these countries are comparatively underdeveloped. They badly need help, encouragement, a belief that they can succeed in their various goals of combining their own ancient cultures and national pride with modern technological development. They need to feel that the pigment of their skins, their long condition of poverty and illiteracy, will not in any way militate against their receiving help from the democratic countries of the free world such as the United States.

Marian Anderson went as our ambassador to these people.

With her great singing voice, her beauty, character and charm, she has carried that message of hope to the colored peoples of the world with vital impact. When she sang the Ava Maria, they heard all men of all Christian times appeal to a mother beyond the skies to guide their faltering and harried footsteps. In the magnificent spirituals of her own people, they heard the cry of a minority race of high emotional power and capacity for great suffering and great laughter in the United States. They too were crying out to be relieved of the bonds of poverty and disease and ignorance, and lack of opportunity and technological development.

Marian Anderson, a great American woman of color, was one with them when she sang. She was all the oppressed people of all time, all nations, all vicissitudes of servitude. They identified themselves with her in her songs. Her cry was their cry. And because of the eternally universal language of the great human voice singing, she reached their hearts as well as their minds.

They took her into the shrines of their nations, into the secret places of their culture where people from other lands had not been invited to go before. She was invited to speak at the Mahatma Ghandi shrine in Old Delhi, where no American official or visiting dignitary from a foreign nation has before been invited to speak.

She said to the people of Thailand when she introduced the song, 'Trampin':

The Negro spirituals are songs of my people. When they were very sad they made these songs. Later, their songs were a bit more gay, but this one means walking along slowly and very hard, because you have on your shoulders many unpleasant things, and so the song means when you go to the other land, everything will be beautiful.

Abraham Lincoln, one of the Presidents of whom you have learned much, made for the Negroes in America a freedom—we say emancipation. And after this freedom for which they were most grateful, their songs began to be more gay. Why? Because they began to feel that they "belong."

And then our great American singer's voice said to the people of Asia:

I'm trampin', trampin', tryin' to make heaven my home.

Hallelujah, I am trampin', trampin', tryin' to make heaven my home.

The Saturday Review of Literature thus summed up the message which Miss Anderson took to the Far East as it was condensed in the CBS program:

You have been slaves to white masters from the West. Now you are your own masters, free to choose between the Communists and us. Both are prepared to radiate to you the West's industry, literacy, and material betterment. But the Communists will make you pay a price for that—a second slavery and a poverty of spiritual values. Choose the West and you will gain your freedom and dignity as well as science and technology. Marian Anderson is the image of your own future—if you follow us.

In Rangoon, Burma, Daw Mya Sein, a Buddhist scholar, said to our great American contralto:

The Buddha made no distinction at all between whether a person is rich or whether he's poor; whether he belongs in the same caste or that caste, and in one of his sermons, you know, when he was talking about outcasts, he said: You are not born an outcast just the way you are not born a Brahman high class. It is by your deeds that you become an outcast or by your deeds that you became a Brahman.

And to this Marian Anderson answered:

And whether you call it one faith or another, is not too terribly important, I think, if we are striving, all of us, to do the very best that is in us to do.

Mr. President, though Miss Anderson's prime job was visiting the Asian peoples, she took the time on her way to the Far East to sing to the GI's in an amphitheater carved out of the Korean hills. In her audience were not only soldiers from the United States, but from Turkey, Greece, Britain, Thailand, France, and Korea. The Eighth Army choir, conducted by a Korean civilian, accompanied the lady from Philadelphia. She sang for them the universal favorite, "Home Sweet Home."

Gen. Edmund H. Leavey at the close of the CBS broadcast had this to say:

It seems to us that the critical problem which faces mankind today is whether man can learn to get along with man, and whether the means of communication which we have today can serve mankind to interpret our common hopes and our common aspirations. It seems to us that in establishing communications with the people of Asia, Miss Anderson has done a useful and very important job.

I agree with General Leavey. Miss Anderson has made a great contribution to communication between the peoples of the free world. As a woman, as an artist, and as an American, she has given her people and her Government cause for pride.

IDLE STEEL PRODUCTION FACILITIES

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, this morning's New York Times reports that steel production for the coming week will be at only 50.5 percent of the industry's rated capacity, a 6-year low. This is shockingly bad news.

If we only have regard for the effect on our domestic economy, we must be deeply concerned that the bellwether of American industry is now one-half idle. We all realize, of course, that this means tragic unemployment. We should also realize that this idleness constitutes a disastrous waste of American resources. It means a loss of production that cannot be recovered, totalling literally billions of dollars.

What we may overlook, however, is the tragedy of idle steel facilities in America at a time when we are engaged in a struggle for survival with Communist Russia.

Mr. President, the idle steel plant should be a sharp reminder to our Government that we must press for legislation that will start America on the road to recovery at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this article from the New York Times be printed in the RECORD at this point following my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STEEL OUTPUT HEADING FOR 6-YEAR LOW; RATE FOR WEEK PUT AT 50.5 PERCENT OF CAPACITY

The lowest weekly steel production in nearly 6 years—not counting those weeks when output was reduced by major strikes or holidays—has been scheduled by the industry for this week.

The American Iron and Steel Institute reported yesterday that the steelmakers had scheduled output at 1,363,000 net tons of ingots and steel for castings. That would represent operations of 50.5 percent of the industry's rated capacity. It also would be the lowest total for a week during normal production since April 1952.

Last week, 1,417,000 net tons of raw steel were produced, representing operations of 52.5 percent or one-tenth of 1 percentage point more than had been anticipated. In the previous week, operations were 54.2 percent and output was 1,463,000 net tons.

One month ago, or in the week that began on February 24, operations were 54.6 percent and production was 1,475,000 net tons. One year ago, when the industry's capacity was smaller, the furnaces poured 2,364,000 net tons, and operations averaged 92.4 percent of potential.

The figures compared as follows:

	Percent capacity	Production (net tons)	Index based on 1947–49
Week beginning—
Mar. 24	[1] 50.5	1,363,000	84.8
Mar. 17	52.5	1,417,000	88.2
Mar. 10	54.2	1,463,000	91.1
1 month ago	54.6	1,475,000	91.8
1 year ago	[2] 92.4	2,364,000	147.2

[1] Estimated.
[2] Based on smaller 1957 capacity.

With the year's first quarter drawing to a close, it appeared likely that the average rate of the steel industry's operations for the January-through-March period would average about 53.8 percent of the steelmakers' rated potential of 140,742,570 net tons a year. In the same quarter last year, when steel demand was still brisk and before steel consumers began trimming inventories, the industry's operations averaged 96 percent of capacity, which at that time was rated at 133,459,150 net tons a year.

OPPOSITION TO HIGHER RURAL ELECTRIFICATION ADMINISTRATION INTEREST RATES—RESOLUTION BY LAND O'LAKES COOPERATIVE

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, one of the finest dairy food manufacturing organizations in the entire world is the Land O'Lakes Cooperative. It is owned by the dairy farmers themselves—many of them being Wisconsin citizens.

Land O'Lakes recently held its annual meeting, and among other resolutions which its delegates adopted was one which expresses the conviction that modern dairying is absolutely dependent upon electricity.

Mr. Edward R, Morrow

Dear Mr. Morrow:

Sept. 17, 1958

As one smoker usually will do for another, I recommend to you--Temulac--a new concept in pipe smoking which I have invented and, perforce, am introducing to a client-ship of the elite.

A method in my madness is to give away a few expensively hand-made prototypes to some prominent and qualifiedly inveterate smokers, such as one I presume you are. Among the pioneers already smoking a Temulac is Mr. Bing Crosby.

I am a viewer of your Person to Person shows, and the others, too, and I still remember your trip through a Chinese Junk. I also notice your constant cigarette smoking and, at your age, I wonder if you have given thought to it. Just one nice thing about Temulac is the ease with which a cigarette smoker can makeareluctantly difficult switch to a better smoke. (see description herewith)

Some of our greater personalities, political, scientific, etc., were or are pipe-smokers. To name a few: Charles G. Dawes, Albert Einstien, RobT. J. Oppenheimer, Dr. Dudley White, Bennet Cerf, et al. Then of course we'll always have Sherlock Holmes and Santa Claus.

I can fancy similar and pleasant companionship for you and my brain-child. This seems easy to achieve, providing you as a donee enjoy smoking the Temulac.

IT's Best to remove lettle

And, further providing, that you acknowledge and promise that within fifteen days after recipience of a Temulac as a gift, and its trial by fire, that you will report to me your reactions, pro or con, and grant permission for me to inform others of same. You will not be obligated to make any other testimonials. This offer is, necessarily, for early acceptance and is revokable for any just cause.

For the nonce a Temulac must retail at $48. The one I hope to send to you has cost me over $100, and may evolve as a museum piece. None is on sale any where, since I expect word of mouth to create a demand which will not overwhelm me nor dissapoint some patrons.

In your letter of acceptance please state your most direct mailing address.

Cordially yours

G. E. Powell

GREETINGS: from Temalac, the epip of ecoap

Since a pipe smoker is also the stoker, this information will avail you the healthful-enjoyment, comfort and peacefulness built into this delightfully smoking pipe.

Temalac embraces the principle of low-heat-cookery which enhances and preserves food flavors. It is a fact that no food or other heat-processed substance is improved when overdone. A piece of toast is most flavorful if uncharred. An overheated weld in metal is no good. You probably know of other examples and may very well agree that the mere incineration of tobacco is not the ultimate in smoking.

More cigarettes are smoked because they are cooler and, consequently, milder. A cigarette, and a cigar, too, burns in an environment of the air around it. If smoked slowly—and properly—only the end is afire, and its length helps to cool the smoke. When smoked rapidly a long cone of fire glows and the smoke is hotter, as in a common pipe.

The burning tobacco in a pipe, however, is in an environment which increases in temperature with the insulating ability of the bowl. Temalac uses an aluminum bowl liner for quick, even heat transfer into the integral air-cooled bowl jacket. Thus, the burning tobacco can emate excess heat and so burns cooler, similar to a cigarette. The cooling jacket gets hot to the touch and gives relentless proof of the extraction of that heat from the fire within the bowl. Further proof is that the bowl liner does not coke-up in the fire area and, also, that some tar which congeals by condensation in the liner rim can be wiped clean with a wet cloth. The bowl liner and jacket are permanently attached and not removable.

It is obvious that your favorite tobacco will be milder when smoked in a Temalac because the fire is kept cooler. Proof can be had by alternating smokes with your best pipe. Pipe-tobacco burns slowly in a Temalac and often half a bowlful will satisfy. The bowl size can hold the crumblings of two cigarettes.

The tiltable flap-pan in the bowl bottom provides a circular grate so that air is drawn down around the wad of tobacco and makes it burn like a haycock—over the outside and inward. The bead insulated flap lever provides for draft adjustment, so, you should stuff in the tobacco firmly. Should you get it too tight for easy draw (as when borrowed) just lift the lever slightly. When lighting-up draw strongly to get a deep bed of fire; and from then on draw gently for the nicest smoke ever.

The ample-broad bit is rotatable on its sealing ring for balanced alignment of the bowl weight while lightly held in your teeth. The condenser tube reamer blade is permanently attached in the bit. Concave finger-pads provide for twisting the bit, even in darkness, as you remove or replace it in the condenser tube which is permanently attached and partly concealed in the stem. The bowl bottom and stay cool enough to be comfortably clasped with your fingers.

The condenser tube and the reamer blade combine to provide a cool dry smoke and a healthful treat. Nicotine and tar are condensed on the inner surfaces. The amount of condensate will vary with the dampness of the tobacco, size of wad smoked, humidity and temperature. The bevel-edged hole in the reamer blade provides for capillarity drainage and suppresses condensate gurgle at the bit inlet—for no disturbance of your peaceful smoke. The first few puffs can show to you—on twisting and removal of the reamer blade—the material which did not enter your lungs. Nicotine will be present in the few drops of liquid which may be poured from the tube after having smoked a pipeful. The turry blade may be cleaned on toilet tissue; and if you form a habit of frequent cleaning you absorb less tar and nicotine into your blood because a clean condenser is more efficient. In a factory test, a tea-spoonful of tar and nicotine was garnered in one day of average on and off smoking. A blue Litmus-paper test showed acid. The spoonful, if taken as a dose, might kill a person. The test was made in 65-75 degree weather. The cooler the weather, the more the condensation.

The Tesmilac is designed to automatically dispose of the condensate: When finished smoking turn the pipe upside down so the condenser tube will drain through the annular grate slot and onto the hot embers. Often, and providing you have smoked the wad down and temperature conditions produced a goodly quantity of condensate, a hissing can be heard as the ashes are quenched. A deep or thick, cool dottle will muffle the sound. So, wait a few moments or lay the pipe aside for steam permeation to snuff out any embers. Then turn pipe upright again and tilt the flap lever up, just enough to loosen the ashes, and then down. A pat of the bowl rim to the palm of your hand or a whip motion will throw out the dottle, and with no afterburning. In any event, just emptying the bowl in the conventional manner will dispose of the liquid condensate and partly quench the embers, with some measure of safety.

Always empty the bowl while it is warm and thusly avoid adhesions when cold. The bowl liner is made precisely thin, so, avoid scraping it with metal tools. (a thick liner will cool too fast) A toothpick is just right to clean the grate slot and to reach under the fully tilted flap-pan for clearing any deposit caused by inverting the bowl when quenching. Additional service tips are included with each shipment so you get all benefits.

The Tesmilac abolishes the expense of owning and drying out a series of common type pipes in order to get a little dry smoking from each. Owing to much precision workmanship necessary and the superior benefits derived from the functional accessories, a Tesmilac must, and always will, cost much more than the common pipe. And, even so, if you don't smoke a Tesmilac, we lose.

Since the frailties of smokers are unpredictable, a Tesmilac is not guaranteed that one will like, love or enjoy it, nor is it sold on approval.

However, experienced pipe-smokers—knowing what is desirable and without price as an object—are preponderantly appreciative of Tesmilac's worth.

A Tesmilac is not guaranteed against crushing—dropping—rapping or scraping on hard surfaces—forcing of tilt lever beyond its limits—or untoward abuse and inept servicement.

A Tesmilac is pre-smoked, sterile and is guaranteed to be in perfect condition when shipped. Defective parts will be replaced free of charge within ~~XX~~ one year of purchase date when received post-paid at the factory and regardless of original purchaser's name; as a courtesy to gift donors. All parts, or the entire pipe must be returned.

Dear Ed:

I understand that you are taking off next week, and I was wondering whether there was a chance of getting a reaction from you on our Current memorandum which I sent a couple of months ago to your home.

We are progressing with all deliberate speed on various fronts and hope to put out a first issue in the fall but are still short of some financing. Any suggestions along this line from you would be a great help.

Best wishes.

Yours,

Eliot

Dear Dr. Pratt:

I write in reply to your kind invitation to Mr. Murrow to deliver the Commencement address on January 17. Unfortunately, he is on a year's sabbatical leave and does not plan to return to the United States until July, 1960, so that I regret I must decline on his behalf.

As far as Mr. Sevareid is concerned, I very much doubt that he will be able to do this for you, as he has replaced Charles Collingwood as our London correspondent. However, as I do not know what his plans are that far ahead, perhaps you would like to write to him c/o CBS, 26 Hallam Street, London W. 1

We would like to extend a cordial invitation to you or Mr. Eric Sevareid to deliver the Commencement address on Sunday, January 17, 1960, at 2:00 p.m.

Indiana State Teachers College is the largest teachers college in Pennsylvania and has an enrollment of 2,800.

For this service our budget has an allowance of $600. We trust that you or Mr. Sevareid will find it possible to accept this invitation.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

THE VERDICT IS YOURS continues to carry a few of us along with its rise and in June I'll be given Associate Producer billing of the day-time as well as the expected nighttime version. It's all very well and perhaps nowadays anyone should be delighted with a steady job, but I still feel out of my element and too far removed from the important things going on in the world.

If, in the fall, you can use some additional aid on your staff, please keep me in mind. Besides the fire in the belly, which, I think, has not gone out, I can now offer a couple of years of varied TV experience.

Dear Ed:

Approximately a year ago at the Robert Sherwood Awards you so graciously complimented me on our story on Irv Gitlin's public affairs programs in Telefilm Magazine's April 1958 issue.

I am enclosing another copy of that issue with the story and would very much like to have you pass on your comments.

With all three networks failing to support a trade magazine that has occasionally criticised them for the past three years, I find myself in the position of possibly returning to my teaching career.

Therefore, in seeking out some memoirs I would appreciate some brief comments on this particular story which was planned a year in advance.

Thank you for this consideration.

Public affai

Conquest

By Frank Orme

Not long ago, many of us who have a serious interest in broadcasting's overall stature looked upon the broadcaster who would permit commercial sponsorship of his public service programs as a creature willing to sell his soul to the devil.

. . . And part of this point of view is still valid. A lot of broadcasters, in their too-eager search for profits, did let down the bars against improper exploitation of public interest programs.

However, some changes have taken place. The networks and many individual stations have developed tastes, restraint, and other forms of maturity in the presentation of public service programming. Also, there is a growing field of informational program series which would not be possible at all without commercial support.

It takes no compromise with principle to admit—or even to proclaim with enthusiasm—that we have with us now a dawning era of electronic journalism which is not only frankly profit-making, but is also building new guts, sinews, and bones into the entire broadcasting structure.

Why? . . . and how?

Why today, if it was not so at TV's beginning? What is the fountainhead behind the present steady flow of impressive documentaries?

Is the emphasis on informal shows such as Twentieth Century, Wide Wide World, Conquest, Omnibus, and See It Now just a flurry of do-goodism which will again become spasmodic under economic pressures or the slackening of demands on broadcasters by Congress and its bureaus?

Who makes these programs? What is their significance to the film industry?

"Informal programs are beginning to come of age,"

The Twentieth Century

people who remember

sponsors get a lot more than ratings.

says Irving Gitlin, head of Public Affairs for CBS. "They have changed in type, and today we have much more available production personnel and creative talent. So the programs have increased in quality, scope, and depth. We are hoping for complete equality between informational and entertainment programs."

Gitlin, 39-year-old former biology teacher and ex-Marine, is responsible for Twentieth Century, Conquest, The Last Word, Face the Nation, and a whole list of other public affairs programs—both commercial and non-commercial. He has been with CBS since 1946, when he joined the network after two years as a radar expert in the Pacific Islands.

Gitlin is both an administrator and an experienced creative producer. He was producer-writer for radio's Hear It Now, The Nation's Nightmare, and Primer for Survival. He produced the 26-episode The Search, which, as well as Nation's Nightmare, won the Peabody Award. He was executive producer of the outstanding mental health documentary, Out of Darkness.

So Gitlin speaks with authority. The impressive things about him as a person are his candor, enthusiasm, "practical" outlook, and conviction that "people" are important individuals who will respond intelligently to the best that radio and television can produce. A visionary. certainly—but a man who would look at the rocks below before jumping off a cliff to test a Kleenex parachute.

Regarding commercial sponsorship, Gitlin says:

"The more sponsors we get, the more money we'll have to do the things we need to do. For the sponsor, public service is good business. It's terribly important to the corporation to build a 'corporate image' in the minds of the public. Shows like NBC's Wide Wide World and Project 20, and our own Twentieth Century and Conquest promote this corporate image in ways which are impossible to programs of other types."

The output of CBS documentary film far exceeds the output of any other single unit in history. It includes not only films produced by Public Affairs, but also the See It Now shows supervised by Ed Murrow and Fred Friendly. The Public Affairs department, and the Murrow-Friendly operations, are all a part of CBS News, headed by Sig Mickelson. CBS News employs about 600 full-time persons, of whom about 200 are in Giltin's Public Affairs department.

Gitlin is convinced that the properly constructed informational show, produced with flair and showmanship, can stand up on an even basis with entertainment programming in any market. This points the way toward the CBS Public Affairs goal of regular programming during prime evening hours throughout the week. Maybe this will begin next season. Certainly, he predicts, the next three or four years will see big changes.

Gitlin may not have 20-20 vision into the future, but his confidence, backed by the past record of CBS and the present upsurge in other areas of the broadcast scene, indicates that the commercial informational program is with us as a permanent fixture, and that it will continue to grow in volume and scope.

We have to accept this prospect with a certain amount of misgiving. Mass production of high-quality programming is extremely difficult. There is the possibility that the increasing success and volume of commercial public service programs will crowd the less colorful and generally unsponsorable—but nevertheless important—programs off the air, or into even more inadequate time periods than they have now. There is an ever-present danger, in places which might be less rigidly controlled than Gitlin's CBS department, that commercial sponsorship will lead to distortions and over-dramatizations in informational programs in order to increase ratings. Also, there is the possibility that sponsors and advertising agencies will control content and production in order to keep program material in line with the sponsor's viewpoint.

"We're at a frontier of internal journalism" says Irving Gitlin, Director of CBS Public Affairs

These things can happen; they have happened. The broadcasting fraternity has a lot of members who are suckers for almost any money-baited trap. Not just broadcasting, either: some of our highest circulation magazines have relied on the fictionalized "fact"—the distortion of reality wherein readers are misled into accepting what is in essence fiction under the disguise of "factual" reporting. And we all know what the motion picture industry has done with the "lives" of past celebrities.

These are real and present dangers, and they can't be passed off with a glib "So What?" The subject is too important.

Fortunately for the public and industry alike, CBS has pioneered and developed the field of commercial informational radio and television programs. CBS News is no doubt the most respected unit in broadcasting today; Irving Gitlin is a man of the highest creative talent and personal integrity. Happily, the other networks and scores of stations, have been doing a great deal of fine work in this area. The CBS leadership has been due not to a corner on talent, but to organization within which creatively endowed persons pool their abilities from the administrative level right through the production stages.

Gitlin is fully aware that certain programs—talks, religious programs, debates, discussions, etc.—must be maintained by the network on a sustaining basis. These are the "must do" things which he separates from the commercial public affairs shows. "But," he said, "the network's editorial policies for the sponsored programs are exactly the same as those for the unsponsored programs. CBS maintains absolute editorial control."

These were not words spoken as a defense against probing questions. Gitlin speaks freely, without inhibition. He talks cheerfully about mistakes and shortcomings. When talking with Gitlin you get a distinct impression that what he says is the complete truth as he sees it. There is on effort to hide, color, or veer away from sensitive subjects. This is important because, in essence, good informational programming is a search for, and presentation of, simple truth.

Gitlin says that people are hungry for new experience. for new faces, for new ideas; that they want to know, for example, the whole story about where we stand in relation to Russia, whether it hurts or not. He says also that public affairs programming has developed a new breed of producer, director, and writer who must not only be interesting, but unflinchingly accurate.

Production Techniques

There have been some exceptions, but most of the significant documentary programs on television have been produced on film. The reasons are obvious—geographic locations, time lapse necessities, etc. The techniques used, however, are not those which have become rule-of-thumb standards for the film industry.

"Generally," Gitlin asserts, "film techniques used in our documentaries are based on creating an illusion that what the audience sees is happening here and now. We'll hold a close-up for 10-minutes if it keeps on telling our story."

This, of course, is a violent departure from the standard editing techniques used by most film producers, who use cuts far more frequently to maintain "pace" and to avoid "monotony." CBS Public Affairs producers, in fact, have drawn much more extensively from the traditions of live TV and radio shows than from the film industry.

Regarding close-ups, Gitlin says:

"We use a lot of them, and for reasons which involve more than just the smaller size of the TV screen. What we do is turn the camera on and let the audience see what happens. We use a reportorial technique. We try constantly for a sense of reality and intimacy."

CBS Public Affairs techniques no doubt stem from the conviction of Gitlin and his staff that the element of believability is much more important in television than in the theater. He looks on theater as "escape." Also, he believes that the TV screen has a communication factor that is lacking in the closed screen of the movie theater.

A sharp example of this technique is the mental health documentary, Out of Darkness. This was first televised as a 90-minute program on Sunday afternoon, March 18, 1956. Al Wasserman, still a member of Gitlin's impressive staff of producers and writers, wrote, directed, and produced the program. Hollywood cameraman Fred Dietreich achieved remarkable photographic results by shooting, through one-way glass, some of the longest and most graphic close-up shots ever filmed.

Out of Darkness is a literal example of the "turn on the camera and let the audience see what happens" technique. No Oscar-winning actress has ever surpassed the unwitting performance of the mental health patient, Doris L. Production slickness may also have been lacking in some parts of the program, but it was a tense drama with a tremendous emotional appeal.

There is a factor here which may be of interest to the thoughtful producer of films for television in any field. Both Gitlin and John Crosby (see story elsewhere in this issue) believe that the reportorial thechniques used in informational programming can be used successfully in dramatic programs.

Possibly, but:

We have to remember that the creative evolution of informational programming is a result of efforts to portray truth as realistically as possible. Gitlin and others have borrowed the tools of the theatrical film (and television film) people, and have used them without preconceived ideas about procedure. The film producer must be aware that where the resulting reportorical technique has been dramatic, the drama actually existed before the camera. This production style emphasizes starkness and reality. It could be disastrous if applied to shallow formula material, because it exposes whatever it sees.

On the other hand, if the dramatic material is superior —whether fact or fiction—techniques which aim at deep penetration rather than slickness of production could be tremendously successful. This is a major reason why the best dramatic programs on television have usually been live productions. To put it bluntly, the higher developed slickness of standard film production often protects and exploits mediocrity. It can conceal, to a degree, weaknesses in the basic material.

Gitlin says this about his own methods:

"You can say only what is shown. If you break from this, the audience will know it."

The audience was aware, probably, when Twentieth Century itself broke from this "saying only what is shown" policy during part of the otherwise intriguing Class of 1958 program on March 23. Admittedly, educators have a big and important message to get across to the public. But the producer here did not rely wholly on the natural material at hand or the audience's intelligent appraisal of what was going on. In the climactic scene in the school principal's office, the dialogue between the senior girl and the principal was unreal and overplayed. The "message" was larded in too heavily.

But this may be quibbling over a short lapse in an ordinarily fine program. Nobody bats a thousand, either in baseball or public affairs programming.

Program Content

Gitlin defines a public affairs program as one whose primary intent is to inform and instruct, rather than to divert. Subject matter for the documentaries is selected by its importance and by the department's decision on whether or not it can handle the topic graphically.

Material for the commercial informational programs is gathered from everywhere. According to Gitlin, "reality is limitless." He says:

"We are not nearly as limited as the creator of fiction, even though our belief in this is the reverse of the general concept. The television audience has accepted informational programming. Television itself has created a restless appetite. People want something new and fresh—something with increased sophistication. The old saw that any entertainment show will outrate any informational show is not true."

So the entire world—and outer space— is the legitimate range of the documentary producer—the world, and everything in it which is important to individual human beings.

Gitlin is moving toward a challenging future. He puts it this way: "We're at a frontier of 'internal journalism.' We are becoming more perceptive, and we're achieving more penetration through human stories. This is the great untapped area in informational broadcasting."

Sponsorship

Informational programming should never be sold to the advertiser for direct sales campaigns on a cost-per-thousand basis. These programs are not for the toothpaste, soap, or breakfast food manufacturers. They have very special qualities, however, for the company which needs to sell itself, for any of several reasons, to the public. Through the act of paying for informational programming, the sponsor becomes a participant in an important public service. The public knows—and remembers.

Prudential is a veteran advertiser with CBS Public Affairs, following its sponsorship of the 26-week Air Power series with its present (and recently renewed) bankrolling of Twentieth Century to the tune of several million dollars per year. Company agents say that the program is the best "door opener" they've ever had.

Monsanto, sponsor of Conquest, is another enthusiastic supporter of the documentary program. Conquest has a built-in theme, "conquest through chemistry," which was developed for another chemical company before Monsanto bought the show. The program has accomplished its commercial objective: it has brought Monsanto into the forefront of the public mind as a leader of chemical research and development.

Wyeth Laboratories sponsorship of the single program, Out of Darkness, has been a continuing demonstration of the effectiveness of the soft-sell approach. Wyeth did not advertise at all on the television program. All it said was: "Wyeth Laboratories, in cooperation with the American Psychiatric Association and the National Association of Mental Health, is priviledged to present Out of Darkness —a CBS Public Affairs production." The response was gratifying.

Moreover, Wyeth did not buy just a television show, it bought an industrial film, just as Prudential and Monsanto and other sponsors have done on other occasions. This is a tremendously important factor in the overall values of informational shows. Exposure is continuous. Many of these documentaries go into the very large and very rewarding non-theatrical circuit which on occasions reaches millions through showings in schools, churches, conventions, service clubs, industrial plants, civic groups, and other outlets. In the case of Out of Darkness, showings before state senates and assemblies have resulted in direct legislative aid to the mental health movement . . . And Wyeth stands out as a benefactor to the whole field of psychiatry.

FACE THE NATION

Again, these programs usually get far greater press coverage and press promotion than most entertainment shows. There are other promotional benefits, too. Prudential, for example, is already opening the doors of the future for its salesmen with program guides for Twentieth Century distributed in schools, as well as with special school showings of past programs. All of these things add impact, and impact to the sponsor means, in one way or another, an eventual cash return.

There are a lot of corporations in the country which have never come into radio and television because broadcasting has never offered them anything they can use. It may be that informational programming, which can be sold through qualitative evaluation, will bring new strength into the industry's economic bloodstream.

Irving Gitlin insists that the "selective" audiences which watch informational programming are the same "less selective" audiences which watch the big entertainment shows—the same people, exercising different tastes and interests according to their moods and inclinations at various times.

There is one thing about the audience of informational programs which is certain—it is generally more attentive. These programs, when well done, demand attention. They stimulate thought. Almost always they have a continuity which must be followed from beginning to end. The commercial advantages are obvious.

Paradoxically, it has been left to the "collapse" of radio, under the impact of television, to prove certain qualities which have, without a doubt, always existed in the audiences for broadcast programs. When television "took over," there were less than 800 radio stations in the United States. Out of the avalanche we have witnessed the amazing emergence of radio until today we have 3,000 stations in this country, and applications are pending for 500 more.

What happened was this:

Radio, as primarily a provider of escape entertainment, was crushed. Then, with a suddenness born of desperation, radio changed into a service medium. Today, radio has a strong and straight backbone composed multiple services to individuals—news, information, and music. The music, of course, is chiefly for "background" listening. Commercially, news (with interpretation) and "information" (in depth) are radio's hottest products.

A person wants to know. He is curious. Whatever he understands becomes his personal concern. Basically, human beings have always been like this. But broadcasters have traditionally been blind to the qualities of the only thing which is important to them at all—the individual who watches or listens to their programs. They have played on the lower levels. They've played to appetites, rather than to minds, disregarding the commercially valuable fact that appetites exist only so that minds may advance us toward our destiny.

One thing we can be sure of: today's audience is the most discerning in all history.

Conclusion

To this pont, this article has placed a lot of emphasis on money. In a sense, a commercial documentary is a commercial venture. You add a lot of these programs together and you come up with a multi-million-dollar demand which must be met in order for the programs to survive. Unless this field were to the subsidized by governmental or philanthropic sources, the "survival funds" must come from commercial sponsorship. However hard it is to dig out, advertisers' money has become available.

But money can carry informational programming only so far. In fact, all it can do is move the producer, director, and writer up to the starting line and provide the facilities and craftsmanship which are needed.

WHERE WE STAND

OUT OF DARKNESS

There is a very simple thing which is often overlooked in broadcasting's confusion of "codes" and pious expressions of "self-regulation." Not once—not ever—has a single inspirational high-quality creative program been produced as a result of obligations, threats, moral pressure, or physical force. Such programs spring from an inner compulsion for expression which is the force behind all creative achievements. All the sponsor can do—or the broadcaster—is unlock the talent by providing the opportunity for the expression.

Actually, the motives of the sponsor are not important, so long as he does not buy, along with his sponsorship, the right to control or interfere with program content or its manner of presentation.

The important thing is this:

The informational program is a means of enriching the minds of millions who desperately need knowledge and understanding to react intelligently to today's problems. Today the whole world is everybody's backyard. We have to know what's in it, and why it's there. ★

Is It Worth a Long-Term Mortgage?

There's a saying around the entertainment business: "As long as there are films, there'll always be westerns." This is true without a doubt, but some of the implications which go along with the shopworn adage may not be true at all. Undoubtedly, if nobody ever made another western, the supply on hand would last through a decade or more.

There is no doubt about the lasting qualities of these programs. This is an aspect which, from the viewpoint of the producer and the syndicator is not an entirely unmixed blessing. The demand for these programs, even a year from now, certainly will not remain at its present peak . . . And there's a lot of evidence that the market is already glutted with more of these series than it can assimilate. Several shows in which huge investments have already been made were cancelled even before the season got under way. Several others are running the network circuit with make-do sponsorship or with no sponsorship at all.

In th spring of 1958 all three of the networks made major errors in estimating the amount of violence-saturated programming the American TV viewer is willing to consume. Even with some scheduled programs dropped altogether we have many instances where westerns, action mysteries, and hybrid variations of the crime format are bucking against each other for ratings during the networks' prime option periods. Several other such programs are ready for instant replacements for any shows — particularly among the faltering quizzes—which show rating weaknesses during the first weeks of the season. First to go into the national market, of course, will be the series in which the networks have controlling interests and substantial investments. New programs of violence produced for syndication will have to compete not only against the network option time and "minimum buy" systems, but against already produced properties which are poised and ready to go at the first opportunity, and the log-jam of lower-priced shows available as re-runs.

Also, there is the extremely serious and rapidly growing audience resistance to the overbalance of violence in today's television schedules. The Newsweek article, Dial Anything for Murder (October 13), only echoes scores of similar protests. While there are still very large audiences available for the westerns and mysteries, some sponsors are refusing to be identified with programs which are stirring up deep antagonisms among substantial segments of the population—antagonisms, in this instance, which originate from newspaper critics, welfare workers, health experts, and law enforcement officials. Advertisers are traditionally timid to the point of being thoroughly ridiculous. It appears likely that if and when a few sponsors who don't want "unfavorable identity" for their products withdraw their support of the violent shows, there will be a wholesale exodus from the crime show bandwagon.

. . . And then what? The man who has the "different" program—say an anthology or "inter-connected" series which features real people in real dramatic situations—will be in the driver's seat. This is one industry in which a "forward to yesterday" movement in some parts of the program structure would represent material progress.

SOUND-ON-FILM IN NEWSREEL

The most economical way of reporting spot television news is with a 16 MM single-system sound camera. This is supported by the fact that more and more stations of late have been utilizing this technique with varying degrees of success throughout the country. This equipment has been designed for the professional and is capable of top-quality reproduction of both sound and picture when used skillfully. The following recommendations have been included in the booklet entitled, "How to Use Your Auricon 16 MM Sound-on-film Recording Equipment" published by the Auricon Division of Berndt-Bach, Inc., 6984 Romaine Street, Hollywood 38, California.

CAMERA SETUP

1. Make a picture and sound-test to be sure the equipment is in perfect working order and has not been damaged, or the camera finder has not been thrown out of alignment from rough handling in transit.

2. Have all lenses cleaned and check lenses for proper seating on lens turret.

3. Clean the film gate and entire film path especially areas of film contact.

4. Ascertain the current voltages AC or DC and sufficient power is available for operation of both camera and recorder. (Never operate lighting equipment on the same line as camera and recorder.)

5. Thread film with care and operate camera with the door open to insure proper threading and take-up.

6. If daylight loading spools are used, check all take-up spools for bent flanges.

7. During extreme cold weather operation to enable the camera to run at normal speed, heat the oil in the bearings before using, by turning on the camera heater 30 minutes prior to operation. To prevent moisture (collected on the lense elements) from freezing keep lenses at outdoor temperature if at all possible.

AMPLIFIER CHECK

1. It is good practice to check the sound track exposure just before the "take", turning the lamp "on" at that time and setting at the correct value.

2. All batteries should be checked each time the equipment is used, and replaced if necessary ahead of time. Battery tests should be made with both ends of the amplifier-camera (or amplifier-recorder) cable connected.

3. In an emergency, it is sometimes possible to record at a lower sound-track exposure than recommended, but this will yield a noiser track or print, due to the transmission of light through the portions of the sound-track which should have been black.

4. The sound volume has to be regulated so that the image on the film will not exceed the dimensions scanned by the reproducer optical system. For correct recording the needle should swing up to the top of the "correct range" only occasionally.

MICROPHONE PLACEMENT

1. Place the microphone as close as possible to the source of the sound, even concealing it in the set if necessary.

2. Studio walls should be covered with soft-absorbing material, low-density acoustic board, or acoustic tile. On location carpets, drapes, and upholstered furniture will serve to reduce the reflection of sound from the walls if strategically used.

3. From a sound reflection standpoint, ideal recording conditions are found outdoors. The disadvantage to such recordings are undesirable sounds such as planes and automobiles. Also the sound hitting the microphone can disrupt recording unless a wind screen is employed. In an emergency a cotton handkerchief can be wrapped around the microphone to reduce wind noise. ★

It's Blowing Up a Breeze

This issue of TELEFILM has been chiefly concerned with Dean Roscoe Lindley Barrow's report to the Network Study Committee of the Federal Communications Commission.

Our own reaction to the recommendations of the Barrow group is "Thank God, maybe we can get rid of the smog!" Obviously, these recommendations are designed to loosen the stranglehold over economic operations and over program content now held by a handful of powers within the broadcasting industry. There is no question that these monopolies exist. They extend through all levels of the industry, and they affect every station operator, every program producer, and every director, writer, and performer in the business. They stifle to a dismaying degree traditional American free enterprise in a vital area of the American scene. Thus the prospect of action based on the network study report—or similar studies by the House Judiciary Committee and the Senate Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee—comes like a fresh breeze to the nine-tenths of the industry which has been becalmed throughout the past years.

This is the time for desegregation. It is time to raise the status of the individual broadcaster from his second-class rating to at least the level of those who supposedly are serving him, but who more often than not are primarily serving themselves through facilities which he provides. The Communications Act of 1934 defines the individual broadcaster as the top man in broadcasting. By law he is the person who controls his own empire, and who is accountable only to the public for the service he supplies in return for the privileges granted to him through his license contract.

We do not imply here that a network service is bad because it makes money for the network. All of us know that networks make magnificent contributions to individual broadcasters and to the public, and that network service is indispensible. But the networks can make these contributions and provide these services without the body-and-soul surrender incorporated into many affiliate contracts and "gentlemen's agreements." Loosening of monopolistic controls won't endanger anything except mediocrity.

In essence, the Barrow recommendations would restore the independence and stature of the individual broadcaster. Independent or "affiliate," he would be his own man—free to select his programming and to manage his station according to his own best judgment. There would be an inevitable reaction all through the industry—freedom of producers to compete on the basis of program quality, and freedom of creative talent to express itself without battling through the frustrating maze of roadblocks inherent in the present system. Networks would thrive. They'd have access to many new sources of creative talent, and they'd remain in a favorable competitive position. Networks don't need the protection of special privilege any more than an athlete in good condition needs a crutch.

We won't presume to suggest here the exact degree or manner of incorporating the Barrow recommendations into the broadcasting scene. That's a job for experts—a monumental project which must be based on careful study and astute judgment. But it's a job already launched, and it appears likely that the status quo of the industry is going to be stirred up a bit. Congress has indicated an active and aggressive interest, and, for the FCC, Congress is the boss.

So break out the canvas, gentlemen. It's blowing up a breeze.

an "informer" who is taking advantage of his success to top-level policy meetings. But an informer conceals his identity with scrupulous care, while Susskind speaks out from the rostrum of the nearest public meeting place. Also, he goes full-circle in his criticisms (and in his praises); he refuses to ignore or remain silent about what he considers to be the ills of television wherever they appear. This, of course, is downright heresy. It brings him face-to-face with those who sit in television's highest adminstrative offices.

There is an element of courage here which should not be overlooked.

You might sum up Susskind's impact on television with this: there's a great difference between letting off a blast in an open field and directing a guided missile, at point-blank range, at a Manhattan tower. There's a difference, too, in the manner in which David Susskind and the professional critics achieve whatever effectiveness results from the expression of their views. The points-of-pressure are not the same: Susskind wants direct results; the average critic wants (and must have) "circulation"—whatever the effects of his (the critic's) comments might be, they come primarily as the result of pressures brought to bear not by himself, but by his readers who have been aroused by his comments. The newspaper and magazine critics play billiards; David Susskind aims the cue ball straight at a single primary target. His procedure is painfully direct.

Even though his ancestors were probably among the first to question the Divine Right of Kings, Susskind does not feel that his own challenge is any king-level attack. He is a rebel, all right, but his rebellion is not directed toward the overthrow of established legal authority, but toward the proprietors who, according to his convictions, have assumed controls over public-domain communications without carrying out their full share of the responsibilities which are inseparably associated with these controls.

Susskind is not only direct—he drives his barbs considerably below the level of surface irritations. He is deeply disturbed about some aspects of television. He does, at times, sound like "God's angry man." For example, there is a ringing emotional depth and sincerity to his views regarding the mass of crime programming which is a basic part of today's television schedules. He calls this "an appalling, shocking indictment of the irresponsibility of networks and sponsors." He says that these crime shows hurt the stature of the industry, that they are definitely harmful to the audiences which watch them, and that they are doing irreparable harm to children.

Regimented nonsense?? . . . More rant than reason?

As the Viceroy man says, "Let everybody decide for himself." But let's have the verdict from a jury which has not been selected from a panel entirely composed of the family of the accused. ★

Keep the "Credits" Straight

A CONSIDERABLE PART of television programming has reached a state where those who are responsible for its conception and distribution cross the street and turn away their heads when members of their own family of programs move into the lamplight of public scrutiny.

For example, a network will bow to its own fanfare in acknowledging the presentation of an outstanding show, but talk vaguely of "producers" and "advertisers" when the parade of third-rate programs are poured out over the same transmitters into the same living-rooms under the aegis of the same network.

Under such practices, advertisers and producers—particularly the producers of television film series—have taken some undeserved whippings in the field of public relations. To illustrate this point, we can take a look at Hubbell Robinson, Jr.'s article in the December 27 Saturday Review. Probably Mr. Robinson (who is executive vice president in charge of network programs for CBS-TV) did not invent the title for his piece: "The Producer's the Villain"—more likely this was the summation of the implication the astute Review editors acquired from reading the text.

At any rate, the impression from the article puts advertisers and producers in an unfavorable light, and places the network in a position of struggling martyrdom as the leader against great odds in a battle which, as Mr. Robinson puts it, "can be won." The battle he describes as "the harrowing process of creativity, of genuine insistence on a high-level of standards and unwavering adherence to them."

Mr. Robinson, whose job makes him the chief "buyer" of programs for CBS-TV, describes his overall appraisal of the production plans of "a representative group of independent producers" in terms which affirm almost all critical evaluation of the same product—or at least that part of it that gets onto the network schedules—as mediocre, or worse than mediocre. Then, in the next sentence, he writes: "Undoubtedly, some of these creatively under-nourished items will end upon the air."

Before anybody can ask why these sub-standard programs will undoubtedly end up on the air, Mr. Robinson continues: "But those of us who have a genuine dedication to seeing television prosper by fulfilling its gargantuan potential should be very busy trying to prevent it. We should be damning them (these shows) in the marketplace, straining with every resource at our command to create offerings more worthy."

These simultaneous processes of preventing, damning, and straining to create bring up a mental picture which seems to have a few shortcomings as a whole work of art. But this isn't the first time CBS has had trouble with incompatibility, and maybe the slight inconsistency of trying to prevent something, and damning it, at the same time that you are nourishing it from its protoplasmic stage isn't readily apparent to those on the inside of the rolling drum.

We'd like to ask Mr. Robinson and his fraternity of network executives why they continue to hire and subsidize the producers of what they themselves call third-class programs. Couldn't the network say to the producer (or advertiser): "This program doesn't meet our standards of entertainment," and reject it?

. . . Or would that be too simple? . . .

THE SHATTERING of the IMAGE by Richard G. Hubler

This novel laid in the Hollywood scene has as its theme: "Hollywood is dead! Long live Hollywood." Best described as a symbolic melodrama showing what Hollywood was like just before the revolutionary impact of television. The central figure is one of Hollywood's last remaining pioneers, now a tycoon, being destroyed by the money barons who have destroyed other greats as well as the movie capital's own imaginative, lusty creativeness and greatness.

Written by a Hollywood motion picture writer—producer, this lengthy novel attempts to and does successfully get to the very heart of Hollywood, its meaning and its vitality, its ends as well as its beginnings. (Price $4.95 published by Duell, Sloan and Pearce, New York City, New York.)

CRITICAL WRITING for the JOURNALIST by Roland E. Woseley

Since it is traditionally the function of the press to inform, guide, and influence, this book attempts to help the critic realize the full extent of his responsibility and to learn how to apply the basic principles of criticism to his work. In addition, the book assists the critic in remaining aware of his readers' or listeners' needs and, if possible, to go beyond mere needs to form tastes and cultural habits.

This handbook serves as a informative guide to making every type of critical writing more effective —reviewing, reporting, evaluating books, music, radio and television program, theatrical productions—in scripts, newspapers and magazines. (Price $5.00 published by Chilton Book Division, 5605 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia 39, Pennsylvania.)

Smoke at the Mountain-Top

In his keynote speech before the National Association of Broadcasters in Chicago, Robert W. Sarnoff, chairman of the board for the National Broadcasting Company, selected the following statement and question to express what he considered to be the most vital issue facing broadcasting today:

> "There is a volume of unfriendly comment which is disturbing the great body of television broadcasters. How does it happen that an industry that has done so much for public service can nevertheless be under so much fire?"

Without commenting on the details of Mr. Sarnoff's vague and groping dissertation on the phenomenon he brought up, we're going to suggest here a simple answer to the above question:

The television "industry" is under so much fire because the television "industry" has been stoking the fires without restraint. Violence on the air has reached an all-time peak, and hundreds of thoughtful critics, backed by thousands of parents and scores of organizations, are expressing their alarm. There is a great deal of mediocrity, even after the partial clean-up job forced by public revulsion to the deceit exposed in the quiz programs. A lot of things are wrong with television programming in general, and many of these things originate at the policy level of network management.

The trouble is this: Mr. Sarnoff is asking that shortcomings be overlooked in view of achievements which actually have no proper relationship to these shortcomings. He knows—or should know—that most critics have been zealous in seeking out and emphasizing the many accomplishments which have made television a vital part of American life.

There's a fire in the barn, all right, and nobody is going to extinguish it with a mass "public relations" campaign through which the firemen explain to the owners of the building that its basic timbers are strong and well-formed. There's the danger that the filmsy inflammable clapboard will destroy the whole structure.

We placed the word "industry" in quotes in the paragraph above in order to distinguish Mr. Sarnoff's apparent definition of the "industry" from the true industry. We don't agree here that three networks and a handful of syndicators constitute the television industry. Actually, this real industry is not under attack, any more than a man who has cancer is under "attack" because a doctor is trying to cut away his malignancy.

Nobody wants to destroy television. The fact is, management which insists on identifying "mass appeal" with "mediocrity" is doing far more toward the destruction of television than the hundreds of critics who want nothing more than higher standards of programming.

Sometimes the patient is his own worst enemy.

Dear Mr. Murrow,

Knowing how devoted you are to the cause for an intelligent, informed and participating citizenry, I would like to acquaint you with the Queens College Seminars for Adults as a worthy source for one of your television programs.

These Seminars, broad in scope and value are not only fruitful in helping adults continue with their education but have even greater value and potential in that each person is better informed, reaches greater fulfillment as an individual and consequently acts more intelligently with and for others to create the best possible way of life socially, economically or politically. In short the humanities become an integral part of our daily lives, not just a phase. Of particular interest, we parents not withstanding measles, chicken pox or whathaveyou manage to leave our children properly cared for and rush to class.

The Class Approach would certainly prove interesting, provocative and stimulating to the general public or perhaps Dr. Marc Belth, our philosophy instructer could be your subject. The Ford Foundation Fund for the Advancement of Education has and is currently aiding Queens College in this endeavor.

I would be most appreciative if an interview could be arranged at your convenience for further discussion. Thank you.

Sincerely,

Sophie K. Price

Dear Mr Murrow,

I regret that you are going to be leaving the airwaves for a while. I hope it will not be for too long.

Your programs - Person to Person and Small World have given me hours of interesting listening. I especially admire the tact and understanding with which you interview such a wide variety of people on Person to Person.

In former years, your radio program You are There was an excellent way to learn history, as well as being entertainment of a very high level.

I also think that the public generally, and people dedicated to truth and fair play specifically owe you a particular debt of gratitude for your expose of McCarthy.

With best wishes for success in your next endeavor and hoping to see

Dear Mr. Murrow:

I listen with great interest to your news commentaries, and see your wonderful T.V. shows at every opportunity. I particularly enjoyed your recent programme on Russia - from the Institute of International Education.

I am always intensely interested in life in other countries and spend all my spare time and cash travelling and visiting countries. Being a mediocre office worker, this takes some planning. I'm hoping my next venture will be to South Africa - via South America. My last trip was to the fascinating Middle East and Turkey where I was able to work for a time, this included office work, baby-sitting and tending a girl's cats and plants while she was on vacation in England.

I would very much like to include Russia if time and cash and of course politics allow, but it seems about the most expensive country. I wonder if there is some way in which one could obtain permission to stay with a Russian family - at a minimum cost, if it would be difficult obtaining permission for this, and who would have to be approached - short of writing to Mr. Kruschev himself!

I look forward with interest to many more of your stimulating broadcasts. I wonder if it is possible to get in to C.B.S. to view any of them.

Very truly yours,

Dear Bob:

I should have written long ago to say the obvious - how much we enjoyed the trip on the Rogue. Sorry you couldn't have made it all the way with us. It looks to me now as though I won't be able to make it for the steelhead this year. Maybe I will have better luck another year. However, if I should happen to come west, I will give you a shout and we will try to get a couple of days, anyway.

Casey learned how to swim rather proficiently after his return, and whenever there is a heavy rainstorm, we compare it to that one on the first day.

I am sending you and Leroy a few record albums which you might care to listen to on long winter evenings.

Dear Ed,

Just a note to express my appreciation for your sportsmanship on the Rogue R. trip, thoughtfulness, & appreciation. Leray enjoyed the trip very much - I'm sorry my stay was so short. ... We will not soon forget the rain we had the first afternoon.

I killed a rattlesnake that evening hiking out.

When & if you are able to return for a steelhead fishing trip, we will be glad to hear from you. As before mentioned, November, or late Oct. are the very best for fishing, & we can usually go on fairly short notice, because the weather is a little chilly at times. However it is actually the greatest atmosphere in which to run the river & fish, & proper clothing assures comfort.

Your presence in our city created no small stir.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

I was driving down to Olympia with a friend from Spokane to appear in support of pending legislation. I tuned in your 5:00 o'clock news broadcast and asked my friend if he caught your program at Spokane. He said, "Why its a ritual with me. I have a radio in the office and tune in every day." I was able to tell him of a like ritual, except that I catch the broadcast on my car radio, purposely leaving the office a few minutes before 5:00 in order to catch the whole program.

There are undoubtedly countless people who depend upon the freshness and incisiveness of your daily broadcast who don't communicate that fact to you. I had often thought that I should, and it was only the incident that I related above that led me to actually write.

I am sure that I speak for countless others when I say that I am deeply grateful for your approach to the important daily developments and that I would feel a real sense of personal loss if those broadcasts were ever to stop. Of course, I have in mind that the excellence of your broadcast is the result of team effort, and what I have said goes for that team too! Many thanks.

Dear Mr. Murrow,

I would like to take this opportunity to thank you for your entertaining and educational programs on radio and television. I have especially enjoyed your film documentaries on various issues and foreign features which have brought some of the flavor and the personalities of other countries into our home.

These films are the reasons behind this letter to you. I would like to enquire how I could obtain a position helping to produce this type of film for you or with a similiar production company. I have nine years of experience and education as a writer-director of industrial documentary films including a Master's Degree in motion picture production from UCLA. I have written, directed, photographed and edited educational, informational, commercial and institutional films concurrent with my position at North American Aviation as a writer-director in the motion picture department.

My interests and background also include sociology and journalism and I have a Bachelor's degree in Political Science. I don't know what information you might have, but I would sincerely appreciate your consideration of this letter. If you desire I will be happy to send a complete resume of my experience and qualifications, please let me hear from you.

"For the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico"

HOLD FOR RELEASE: 12:00 Noon,
Thursday, Sept. 4

SPEECH OF GOVERNOR LUIS MUNOZ MARIN OF PUERTO RICO BEFORE NATIONAL CONVENTION OF AMERICAN LEGION, CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, SEPTEMBER 4, 1958

Thank you, Mr. Commander, for a very generous introduction. It is a high privilege and personal pleasure to be with you here today. I bring you warm greetings from 2,300,000 Puerto Ricans who are proud to be your fellow United States citizens, and many thousands of them who are proud to be your comrades-in-arms.

Like all of you, we have been deeply disturbed by the manifestations of anti-Americanism in diverse parts of the world. We were shocked and indignant over the treatment of Vice President Nixon in South America, as were millions of people in Latin America itself. We were deeply troubled over the dangerous eruption in the Middle East which had such strong over tones of hostility to the principles of the American people and government.

Our concern has not been an academic one. The Commonwealth of Puerto Rico is a geographic and cultural link to the United States in the Latin American world, and a psychological outpost in the underdeveloped world. Probably more than any other U. S. citizens, we have our antennae adjusted to the feelings of Latin Americans, Asians and Africans. Thousands of them come to visit us and study with us every year. We work with them far into the night; we know much about their problems because -- only a few short years ago -- these problems were our problems, too, and they still are if only to a lesser degree.

It is worth pointing out that the anti-United States outbreaks in both Latin America and the Middle East occurred in "underdeveloped" (I'd rather say developing) parts of the world. These incidents, in Latin America at any rate, did not represent the feelings of the people as a whole, and there is no question that they were stimulated by Communists, even though there are not very many Communists in Latin America. But we cannot dismiss the incidents on those grounds. They were built out of antagonisms that could not have been created by the Communists alone.

We can learn from those disorders. The lesson for America is that in wide areas of the globe, there are potentially violent people who wrongly believe that the United States stands for repression, dictatorship, and exploitation in smaller countries, even when they admit that it stands for no such thing at home.

There are millions of people who really believe that the United States is imperialistic, dollar-mad, cultureless, barbaric, scheming -- I think you've heard the long list of shibboleths.

To say that these millions of people are shockingly wrong is to state a truth but not to solve the problem; it only points out the necessity of understanding how they came to believe this, and of discovering what must be done to put the record straight.

Let us turn back for a moment to the annals of the Korean war, and a little known episode in United States military history. I digress, not just because of pride but because an incident on a frozen battlefield has some valuable lessons for dealing with today's world.

During the epic fight of the 1st Marine Division as it battled its way out of encirclement by the Chinese Communits at Changjin Reservoir, there was another drama in the embarkation of the Marines at Hungnan which was largely obscured by the confusion of those dismal December days of 1950. As the exhausted but determined Marines fought toward the south, the U. S. 3rd Infantry Division was simultaneously trying to establish a defense perimeter around the vital embarkation port.

One infantry regiment of the 3rd Division clawed its way north up the frozen highway toward the Marines, and finally reached the key point of Oro-ri. The exhausted Marines came through the lines of fiercely battling infantrymen and made their way to the rear -- their heroic ordeal at a close. As they marched toward the port, the regiment at Ori-ri closed in behind them and formed a rear guard to stand off the infuriated Chinese Communists.

The Marines know what they owed to the bitter defense of the perimeter at Hungnan, and particularly to the infantry regiment which speared its way to Ori-ri. Some of the Marines must have been surprised to discover that the soldiers holding open the escape route at Oro-ri spoke in Spanish although they understood English well, and a few may have even taken the trouble to find out that this was the Puerto Rican 65th Infantry Regiment.

But I doubt if many Marines or other G.I.s knew that the 65th Infantry Regiment was the only one in the U. S. Army whose casualties, throughout the war, were constantly replaced by volunteers, or that over 90% of the 40,000 Puerto Rican troops who saw service in the Armed Forces during the Korean War were volunteers. Their battle records, their high casualty rate, and their large number of high decorations, including the Congressional Medal of Honor, testify to the fact that the Puerto Ricans fought with conviction, bravery, and skill, and above all, unflagging loyalty. Their loyalty is of great significance, since you cannot be loyal to a cause if it expects you to be disloyal to yourself. This is a universal truth which strongly moves people of Hispanic origin.

Can you imagine the Algerians volunteering to fight for the French? Or the Indonesians risking their lives for the Dutch? Or the Indians of today battling for the English? Why then did the Puerto Ricans, who not so long ago were scarcely happier being a colony than these others, feel so differently about the United States?

The answer to this, it seems to me, reveals many of the seeds of greatness of the United States. The U. S. did not insist that Puerto Ricans become carbon copies of people in the States. With rare vision and statesmanship, the United States allowed us a wide range of choice. It offered us independence if we wanted it, and the offer, made in good faith, was itself an act of statesmanship. But we chose permanent union with the United States of America. The result of this action of the Congress of the United States and the people of Puerto Rico was a new constitutional creation. It established by a compact a new manner of self-government, a new kind of state, in a close association of strong loyalty and genuine affection. An entirely new concept of political relationship was born. We discarded nationalism.

I hope that history may record that fact as the forerunner of a trend in international affairs because I deeply fear lasting peace on this earth may not be achieved until we enter upon the post-nationalist phase of world history. A world conscience made adult by the stimulus of nuclear energy cannot long evade it.

The United States gave us its helping hand, and it was always there, but not the hand that pushes or compels or even insinuates direction. The only way we could get our economic development started was by government ownership of factories. I suppose that's Socialism, although we didn't care much what tag was on it, so long as it was carried out in terms of freedom and unfaltering respect for the dignity of the individual. Nobody in the United States denounced us for it. Nobody chose to ostracize us and by so doing create confusion and bewilderment as to the meaning of free, democratic choice. Pretty soon we found out by trial and error we could go further faster with the private enterprise system, and have given and are giving not only free scope but vigorous stimulation to private enterprise in the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico. And I daresay there are fewer Communists in Puerto Rico today than in any state of the Union.

Our relationship with the U. S. has clearly been successful for both. It has instilled a new dignity in the relationship as well as aided a growing prosperity. Today Puerto Rico spends more than $635 million a year in the United States, more per capita than any country in the world, including Canada, the traditional best customer. If Puerto Rican methods in many ways resemble United States methods today, it is because in full freedom of choice we have tried them and found that they worked.

It has also opened a new window for the United States to the world. I have already mentioned that Puerto Rico has become a psychological outpost of the U. S. in its policy of friendly aid towards the other developing parts of the world. With the splendid cooperation of the Department of State we have established a program that has already demonstrated to 5,000 observers from 107 different countries that the United States brand of democracy and freedom works in rapidly raising the living standards of an impoverished people. We too knew the taste of bitter poverty, and the vicious circle of an explosive birth rate, underemployment, insufficient means to provide a decent minimum of health and educational opportunities -- all of which today are the desperate preoccuations of two thirds of the people of the world.

The gulf between the living standard of the United States and that of most of the world is so enormous that the figures almost lose their meaning. It is difficult for Americans, with a per capita income of more than $2,000, to even imagine what life is like for people in countries like India, Haiti, Jordan, and Bolivia, where the per capita income is less than $100 a year. Puerto Rico begins to represent a hope to an increasing number of good people in these and many other countries; yet Puerto Rico's per capita income is only $450 a year -- less than one fourth that of the United States. Try hard to imagine what it would be like for you and your family to live if, tomorrow, your income were cut to almost 1/5 of what it is today, and then try to imagine what it would be if your income were slashed to 1/20th of its present figure! Yet that is how hundreds of millions of people in the world live.

In the vast continents of Asia, Africa, and South America, these countless millions are rebelling today not only against poverty and any remaining vestiges of colonialism, but also against their own feudal dictatorships as they would rebel against the Communist dictatorships if Russia were less ruthless. In Hungary they tried it but they never had a chance.

This revulsion against authoritarianism is a portent which the United States has often misread. With the best of intentions, and despite its own deep democratic traditions -- and steering a course which we all must recognize as a very difficult one -- the United States government has found itself giving the appearance of shoring up dictators in the path of a groundswell which will inevitably sweep these anachronisms away -- even if they are supported by the U. S.

The United States must somehow get out of the line of fire when the inevitable day of reckoning appears. A President of the United States many years ago when questioned about his support of a certain dictator replied, "I know he is an SOB, but he is our SOB." I have great respect for the President who said that, but I must beg to differ! An SOB is an SOB, whether he is ours or not. We cannot afford to confuse the millions and millions of people in the world who just do not believe in SOB's.

It is a topsy-turvy world when, as in one government upheaval after another, the U. S. is believed by many of the people to be "imperialist" and the "friend of the oppressing landlords", while the Russian Communists are able to pose, often successfully, as "champions of liberty" and as the "friends of the oppressed".

Obviously, it is not the job of the U. S. to tell any country how it should be governed -- even if it is governed by a dictator. Just as obviously, the United States, like other countries, must deal with dictatorships, maintain a modicum of working relations with them. We cannot isolate ourselves from realities.

But -- and I emphasize that conditional word -- but, the United States can make it clear, in the eyes of all people, that it does not take dictators to its bosom, and does not assist them in oppressing and exploiting their people. We must deal here with the subtleties of degreee. Essential friendly relations are one thing, an appearance of romance is another.

The United States must not only be true to its own democratic way but it must also appear to be true to it in the eyes of the world. The wife of Caesar, it was said, must not only be good but appear to be good. I realize it was easier to be the wife of Caesar than it is to be the United States in the contemporary world; however, the United States has not attained its high destiny by doing easy things, but by doing hard things. The wave of the future is not tyranny. It is liberty, human dignity, and a hope for a decent life. When it becomes unmistakably clear in other developing countries, as it is in Puerto Rico -- that this is what the United States stands for, International Communism will not only cease to be able to confuse or seduce anyone, no matter how poor, but a new sense of hope will surge through the troubled millions from Siam to Honduras.

When the chips are down, it is not the hired mercenaries of dictatorship that freedom can depend upon. But peoples won to democracy, helped to dignity and economic deceny, will be there in the pinches, in peace or war. Just ask the Marines from Oro-ri!

As per conversation with Muriel Blaisdell of our New York Office regarding some ties we sent to Mr. Murrow.

As per your request we are enclosing herewith another letter exactly like the original, as you wanted to forward the ties and letter to Mr. Murrow.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

After reading your editorial "Off with the Tie, Suh!" I felt obligated to offer you debate on your plea for Casual Dress.

First of all, as you can see by the enclosed Wembley Ready-Tied Neckties, it is not necessary to have them wrapped around your neck.

Secondly, I will refute your plea with a simple question: Would you keep a business date with a president of a bank; go to a Broadway show; or go to a wedding in a sport shirt?

Hoping that you find these ties "summer cool" and wear them in the best of health, I am,

Dear Mr. Murrow

Greeting for a Happy Thanksgiving.

I want to take this opportunity to thank you for the wonderful programs you have brought to us in Small World so far this season.

Words can never say or express the depth of my appreciations in meeting these talented personalities. God has certainly chosen you as a great apostale for communication.

I am in great distress and sorrow, not only have I had a few deaths inside but my only son has not contacted me in almost two yr. My John is a wonderful person, but under the protest of some ~~traitor~~ ~~so of~~ crusading he is not permitted to reach me.

This has been brought

about by a rejected suitor in my youth that swore to make me pay, and he has always incognito been in the back ground weaving the toils of the devil. I had never put importance to this demon and my dear son, has been lead to believe this person to be some sort of missionary, not knowing of the past.

Please bear with me Mr. Murrow and pray that for Thanksgiving, Our Great American National Holiday, I will hear from him.

I know you will help me.

please forgive me for troubling you, but after all my disappointments I can not stand any more and the cause is not sincere.

Suggests an Idea

Edward R. Murrow
C.B.S. Television
485 Madison Ave.,
New York, N.Y.

Dear Ed:

"Person To Person " is and has been wonderful entertainment. But I wonder (and I think you do too) for how long? In recent shows, your interviews have been relegated to subjects, whose lives, apartments and decor hold small interest for the great bulk of American televiewers. I have watched this program for its entertaining value but better still have analysed its worth now and its tremendous potential to an ever-widening audience -- IF -- soemething is done and done soon.

I believe I have an idea for you and you program. It is such and idea - a billion dollar - idea that it would stagger the imagination of not only CBS directors and script writers but the whole television industry. The idea is being offered you first because of the format of your program and because of you, yourself,since the whole idea is related in some small measure to your early activities and your formal introduction to the entertainment world. Suffice it to say that the program idea would positively guaranteee the whole segment of the American viewing public and would be in a sense a "PersontopersonThisisyourlifeand Mikewallaceinterview" all wrapped up into one wonderful program.

Should you be interested in the idea and could make some offer (believe me, I am ignorant of the worth of scripts, ideas or royalties in your world) contingent of course upon its having the worth I think it has, I shall be happy to outline it for you in detail. Insofar as your not being able to use the idea, I will have taken the liberty of addressing an exact copy of the idea to myself, registered, dated and properly sealed to last for a period of three years, or thence to attempt to sell the idea to a comp etetive network. The cost to you of this idea can be a set fee (as we have in my business INSURANCE, a so-called "finder's fee")or a royalty on each performance or some make-shift arrangement whereby I can be paid some token for thinking up the idea, taking the trouble to write you and outline the idea. That figure can be your idea and there'll be no horsetrading since this is my first attempt outside my own field: if it should be accepted successfully, the next venture (if any) will be "who pays firstest with the mostest"

Dear Mr. Murrow:

I wonder whether you would call upon our best journalists to discuss the topic stated in the enclosed letter? I feel that this might bring a lasting peace and prosperity to us and to the rest of the world. (It is true that I am a "nobody" but certainly not a fanatic or dreamer.)

The enclosed letter was composed about 4 years ago. During this time I had the opportunity to discuss this idea with our local professors for political science for long, long hours. The concensus of opinion was that this might cause the downfall of the soviets and the proper way must be sought how to go about it.

I am by no means against catching with the soviès at the present time. However, having in mind this idea, you probably will admit that we are beating about the bush; that neither the soviets nor we are just for the great strive of the masses for a better life.

As a matter of fact, I should have sent you not 2 pages but a full book dealing with all the details of the practical implementation of this idea. Unfortunately, my limited knowledge in English does not encourage me to write a book for publication.

I hope to hear from you.

Sincerely yours,

I. Rabinowitz

ARE WE ON THE RIGHT ROAD?

Our main problem is communism and its aim of world domination. How and what are our weapons to cope with and to fight against those communist dominated countries? There are three alternatives: 1. military war 2. economic war. 3. ideological war.

A. Politicians and military experts, in spite of previous unrealistic prophecies, expressed their opinion and conviction that the future world war, most probably an atomic war, would mean destruction of this world and the annihilation of its population. The past and present race in armaments has proven itself in a waste of money, human blood and efforts. The Big Four conference will undoubtedly admit past mistakes and agree to disarmament.

B. An economic war would mean to our country a national catastrophe. Our rival- the soviets-, as we know, have probably the same vast amount of natural resourses and simultaneously an enormous quantity of cheap labor - labor of 800 million people- people who are able to"tighten their belts" or live on a single dish of rice, people whose government will do everything on their expense. We miss all this! As to ingenuity, facts have shown that the soviets are not behind us, either.

C. Our ideological war shall strive for;

1. To make the soviet masses fed up with their government promises of a better life after this or that "five year" plan.

2. To prove to them that the soviet aristocracy-the working class, has a much lower standard of living than that of the American.

3. That an exchange of students, professionals and other people shall be allowed to come also to our country to see what a good life looks like.

All this may seem fantastic if you bear in mind the "iron and other curtains". However, this might be easily achieved by establishing a. A World Jury Court in Jerusalem- consisting of 2,500-3,000 jurors, in proportion to each country's population, chosen by lottery for one year's term, sessions to meet at Christmas and Eastern season. The jurors will secretly, upon disputes of governments, vote "guilty" "not guilty" or abstain. The majority vote will be taken back to the UN for an intelligent settlement of the dispute.

Figuratively speaking, the United Nations are the world's senate, the World Jury Court is its congress, with the difference, that its representatives will be unpaid, without fear of repraisals to judge to their own conscious.

Each country has a bigger or smaller amount of people, everyone with the same right to be jurors, who are resentful to their government's aims. Their leaders will try their best to improve their material and spiritual position, in order to have their vote in favor of the respective government. This especially will be an enormous task to the soviets, which certainly will make them forget about world domination.

To my knowledge, the population of the Free World is in a proportion 2:1 to that of the soviets. In addition, if we anticipate that a bigger amount of soviet jurors, being on free soil without fear of repraisals will vote to their concious, the cause of justice and common truth will be established in our present world.

B. All the procedure of this court, propoganda and common sense talk shall find a proper place in each country's press, radio and television, a device taht is much more effective than that of"Free Europe".

Will the soviet leaders accept a proposal that makes them dependent on their own people? This remains to be seen. Whatever may happen, after we suggest this idea at the Big Four conference, we are certain to find the soviet bosses softer in their demands, we are also certain that soviet masses will look upon us as their liberators.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

I write as one of your admirers to make a suggestion to you---in the field of "visual communication".

For years your informative programs have helped me considerably in understanding important events and problems, both national and international.

I refer, among others, to the McCarthy telecast, the recent international conversations, the Montgomery interview, and the Dr. Taylor testimonial dinner on WNYC-FM, which was an uplifting, superlative performance.. As a "genius in the field of visual communication", you have shed light on many a dark and confused area.

Surely you will agree that the greatest dark and confused area, as far as Americans are concerned, is that of Red China.

To flourish as a democracy, we need to know, to understand. To continue in ignorance of so vast a complex as Red China is to endanger our very life as a nation. Realistic policies and attitudes must be based on reliable information and knowledge.

Soon you will be traveling on your year's leave. Why not include a trip to Red China---with your camera?

As a reporter will you consider this suggestion---not only as a distinct service to your country---but indeed to mankind?

Sincerely,

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Following our phone conversation last week -- apropos your note of June 5 to Mr. Nielsen -- have discussed your query with Al Wharfield, Vice President in our New York office.

Al has spent six months in England, since the advent of commercial television there, working with various industry leaders in our behalf. As indicated on the phone, I believe he will be able to help you.

As I also mentioned, Al is recovering from an ankle injury incurred while he was vacationing recently in Burmuda. He is now ambulatory and can be reached at Murray Hill 8-1020 (our office) or his apartment at OR. 3-6829.

With best wishes,

Sincerely,

Henry Rahmel

Ramsay, A. E.

Stockholm, September 5, 1959.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

May I, long an ardent fan of yours, bid you welcome to Sweden! During my six years in America, "This is the News" became a by-word which I seldom missed--it raised the curtain for what, indeed, was the news of the day. Eventually, "Good night and good luck!" became almost a personal greeting without which a day wasn't quite complete. And your message on Thanksgiving Day in 1953 will always be remembered by me because it caught and gave so much of what this day is and means in America (as you may know, Thanksgiving is not celebrated as an official holiday in Scandinavia), and it conveyed a great deal about yourself, too. Later, I have watched your TV-programs on several occasions with keen interest and one of my most prized--and often envied!--souvenirs from the U.S. is a complete set of the "I can hear it now"-records.

As one who is keenly interested in people, events, and trends of our time and as one who has grown to admire your grasp of and ability to penetrate these, may I send you a grateful, personal greeting. When I read of your visit in Sweden in this morning's paper, I decided to act upon a long-felt desire and send you these lines. Especially, I would like to tell you what your broadcasts meant to me during my first years in U.S.A. I came there quite young, feeling, as Wolfe says, "naked and alone" in a truly strange, new world. At the same time, I wanted to understand and gain at least some penetrating knowledge of what America was all about. Far be it from me to say that I have attained this knowledge but however much or little I may have understood, your broadcasts over radio and TV have been informative and inspiring as few other experiences. My sincere thanks.

Since I want to be perfectly honest, I must close by adding that it would be the coming-true of a sincerely felt hope of mine if you would find time and interest for even a very brief personal meeting with me. I realize that you are very probably busy with numerous appointments. On the other hand, I'm bold enough to believe that it may be of interest to you, in connection with "getting the pulse of Sweden today", to meet someone who is well rooted in both the U.S. and Sweden and therefore looks upon this country with American eyes while, at the same time, having a somewhat deeper kinship and, perhaps, understanding of it than a true-blue American.

It's in no way my intention to impose upon you but if this letter, in your opinion, is of enough interest to you to warrant a personal meeting, I would be happy and grateful. I may be reached at home today and tomorrow at 0760-322 07. During week-days, my office number is 22 75 20.

Wishing you a successful and interesting trip out of which will be born many more thought-provoking and challenging broadcasts, I am,

Yours sincerely,

Anders E. Ramsay

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Because of the decrepit condition of our machinery we were slow in getting a copy of the older Dabbs tape for you, but you must by now have received the two, one made two years ago in his home in South Carolina, the other more recently here in Philadelphia. I hope you like them and find other people who like them.

I do very much hope also that you have had opportunity to listen to the Norfolk tape and that you feel there is value in distributing this kind of material.

We are in a real cricis on account of the condition of our machinery, and are going to need to find at least $5000 to replace it before we can send out our February listing and resume the distribution of our 15 minute weekly series. So we will be very deeply appreciative of any suggestion you may have as to where we might find it. Of course we're also looking for the larger funds to increase our distribution to the point where it can begin to show consequences onthe country as a whole.

Thank you very much for your time and encouragement.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

I very much hope that Mrs. Roosevelt (whose note to you I enclose) is correct and that you will be interested in our operation. I know you are a very busy person and that a mob of people are always trying to bend your ear toward their special interests. But we do have a totally different approach to the whole business of "propaganda" broadcasting, and since it is already in operation you might find it interesting. I know you can give us some help if you can find the time to meet me.

I'm just recovering from major surgery but the doctor says I can go to New York any time after January 10. Friday is my best day for such a trip, so I'd be happy if the 16th would suit you. Otherwise I could arrange to come any day between the 12 and the 23.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

As you may know, the International Commission of Jurists has sponsored an International Congress, which met from January 5th to January 10th, in New Delhi. From all accounts, and from my own observation, the meeting was a huge success. Some 185 practicing lawyers, judges, and teachers of law from 53 countries attended the Congress in their individual capacities and systematically discussed the Rule of Law in a free society. The Congress was opened by Prime Minister Nehru. It was divided into four committees, each charged with the examination of a section of the working paper prepared by the Commission on the basis of a questionnaire which had been circulated among some 20,000 lawyers in the free world. This working paper covered the field of the legislative, executive, criminal process, judiciary and legal profession. Each committee, after intensive consideration and discussion, reported its conclusions to the plenary session, where, by the unanimous vote of the Congress, they were incorporated into The Declaration of Delhi. The Declaration calls upon members of the legal profession of all countries to give a practical effect to these principles in their own communities.

Knowing your interest in all that the Rule of Law implies, I am taking the liberty of enclosing herewith a set of the reports of the four committees, and a copy of The Declaration of Delhi. I also enclose herewith a copy of the remarks made by Dudley B. Bonsal, Esq., President of the Bar Association of the City of New York, which he has recently made before the New York State Bar Association. I hope this material will be of use to you in your work. You will, of course, feel free to call on me for any additional material or information that you may desire.

Sincerely yours,

Dear Ed. our sincerest congratulations on the most entertaining, provocative, stimulating & intelligent program on T.V. EVER! "Small world"! I suppose a heck of a lot of our listeners-viewers feel as we do - we want to be there, on it & in it! From our setting room we snap & shout comments to Jim guests pro & con! For instance - tonight so much of what Ed Murrow said one agreed with - but does he really suppose that the U.S.S.R. has other than one objective in cultural exchange! to further discredit the U.S & glorify the U.S.S.R. - They have no propaganda the arts, sports, or "What have you" that is not geared to one purpose - their own aggrandisment. Does Mr Stunde seriously contend that anyone in the Communist hierarchy is really interested in the fellowship of mankind! Ye Gods! - Every program so far has produced most provocative questions & answers in many many homes I am sure. Can one be interviewed by your "board of experts" in order to estimate ones competency to appear on your program? There are many things one would like to discuss on such a program & maybe there may be a place for me one day - I would love it!

Best wishes from us all

Yours Sincerely. Basil (RATHBONE)

Thank you a thousand times for sparing me a moment in your busy day and giving me the words of "comfort and advice". I agree with you to leave over any idea with regard to CBS and just wait and see what might come along - anyway I am lucky to be able to go to Ogilvy Benson & Mather as a jumping-board into advertising.

I enclose more copies of my resume as you suggested, but please don't put yourself to any trouble on my account.

I do hope we shall be seeing you again soon - I know that my mama would love to see you before she sails home.

With reiterated thanks for your counsel.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

"Things happen because we permit them to happen." Your kind of reporting is known to me and as such I heartily approve. To carry on more effectively, I suggest a vehicle to convey your thoughts. The primary approach would be to hold up a mirror to ourselves by the use of typical characters who would directly experience the various social and political abuses.

Four characters come to mind, the Irishman with his interest in politics, the Yankee with his exactitude of the law and business deals (Ephraim Tutt), the Southern Colonel with his love of the horses and gambling an anti-negrophile and finally the Jew with his knowledge of human nature and exploitation thereof.

"Politics make strange bedfellows," is a recognised truth. Let all four characters join together in a political club. Let the vicissitudes of the members be ridiculous, ludicrous, raucous or pitiful as the occasion may suggest, advancing one character or another as the occasion warrants.

These characters could travel over the country, visit cities, contact local political groups and rackets, have fun, fall into ridiculous predicaments, indulge in much eating and drinking, smoking and auto buying, always with a humorous twist. The lines could be written around the commercial and so avoid any formal advertising except to announce that the show is available by courtesy of a certain company.

Above all, the program should be simple, slightly above the level of Amos and Andy, point out no morals, draw no conclusions but expose the truth. Sympathy must always be with the character, who considers himself high minded and is always good natured and of enough means to travel.

I ask no financial gain from this suggestion except whatever you may choose to offer.

Very truly yours,

Lowell Sanford Rau

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Something that you said, quoted by LOOK in a feature story about your "year of retirement," has lodged in my mind since the moment I read it. It was a statement to the effect that in the peak hours the TV industry was feeding pap to the American viewer. The thought was made to stand out in even bolder relief by a contemplation of the work that you and Mr. Friendly and your associates are doing. For this work, you deserve our heart-felt thanks. You hereby have mine.

Something further has lodged in my mind as a result of your statements, and it is also in regard to securing answers to this "further question" that I write you. It is this: are there opportunities in the industry for persons who share this awareness of need with you? Opportunites for sincere and willing persons who have no desire for name-credit or personal publicity, but who would be content to aid somewhere in the background, doing the necessary tasks that must go into such efforts as yours and those like them. Opportunities for persons who were not seeking wealth or recognition, but only the knowledge that they were making a contribution to this over-all aim of raising the content-standard of Television.

I sometimes believe that this task to which you have devoted yourself is so important that if I could fit into one of the categories above-mentioned I would be mightily tempted to do it; for this, too, is an expression of Christian concern, though it may not go overtly under that name. If you are ever recruiting, here is my tentative expression of interest. Two qualities I could bring with me would be youth and enthusiasm; other than that— who knows? My work in a small world has been person to person!

Dear Mr Murrow:

I am an artist. I enter my paintings into shows such as the National Academy, the Audabon Artists, the Pennsylvania Academy, the San Francisco Art Association and many other national shows. Sometimes I am accepted and sometimes I am not. Every artist wonders why one painting will make it and another will not or why one painting will not make one big show and be accepted and perhaps win first prize in another. According to statistics more people go to art museums than to baseball games. The lay public is interested in art.

My idea is to go behind the scenes when the jury is making its' decisions and show the paintings and hear the jury accept or reject.

Please let me know if you can use this idea. If you can't would you let me know who might. I would be interested in discussing it as there are many facets in entering national art shows from the artists' point of view that would be of interst.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

The Voice of America is preparing a radio documentary on the subject of disarmament in the post war era. To do an effective and convincing documentary, we should very much like to make use of radio commentaries of the times on several related subjects, and we had hoped that we would be able to use the outstanding American commentators for this purpose.

We wonder, then, whether you would be able to provide us with three items:

1.) a copy of the script or recording of any of your commentaries between 1945 and 1950 discussing the implications of the atomic age -- its dangers and its potential for the welfare of humanity;

2.) a copy of the script or recording of any single commentary of yours discussing the Atoms for Peace proposals of President Eisenhower made on December 8, 1953;

3.) a copy of the script or recording of any single commentary by you on the Open Skies plan proposed by President Eisenhower at Geneva on July 21, 1955. - Collingwood

We carried a story from New York that you plan a Sabbatical of travel and contemplation. It's been quite a few years since we hoisted Martinis after a glorious round of golf at Berlin-Wannsee so this is to say if that "travel" means coming this way, please know that we have a good course with left-handed clubs available and the Martinis are satisfactory.

Dear Mr. Reese:

I have your letter in which you mention your proposal for a television program.

I suggest you write to Mr. Irving Gitlin, our Director of Public Affairs' programs if you care to pursue your proposal.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

We hope that you will not think it presumptuous on our part if we bring our proposed television program to your notice. It is an educational program, one of a history series we are working on, and we call it "The Course of Revolution."

As a journalist, you are aware of the momentous events of the twentieth century which can truly be classified as the age of revolution and war. The object of "The Course of Revolution" is to provide background for an understanding of the times in which we live.

We think that an interesting program can be developed, (audience level, say, Time-Life readership), in which the revolutions that have taken place in China, Russia, Turkey, Italy, Germany and in colonial areas are interpreted under the direction of authorities in these fields and with the necessary film background and musical accompaniment. To assist us in our program we are in touch with history specialists at major universities in the country who indicate their enthusiasm and cooperation in our project. Should you think that it also has merit, we shall be glad to send you a list of these professors.

As we conceive the program, it would be in thirteen half-hour units with, as we suggest, the use of visual and audio aids.

Our purpose in writing to you is to determine your possible interest in helping us launch this program. We shall be pleased to send you any further data you may wish. I plan to be in New York January 26th. If you think it constructive, perhaps a meeting could be arranged to explore this matter.

Yours sincerely,

My dear Mr. Murrow:

Your deep awareness and public concern for the problem expounded in this book has prompted me to take the liberty of sending you a complimentary authors' copy.

OUR NEW LIFE WITH THE ATOM is a handbook on the atomic age, offering the non-scientific layman a "working knowledge" of this great new revolution which has come upon us. We feel that it answers a great need. Until now we have not been able to find anywhere a concise, simply told, yet comprehensive story of atom-splitting with its consequences to us and to our nation and the world.

A survey among my colleagues of State University (most of them Ph.D.'s and many of them scientists, doctors and atomic scientists) led to the shocking discovery that only a small percentage of them had possession of the most fundamental facts about the new age, and most of them were victims of the most ignorant conceptions, such as: "when radioactivity becomes too bad, they will find a pill for it," etc. I would say that not one in a hundred Americans has any grasp of the political implications of this new age, or of where it may lead us.

Yet everywhere we found, mixed in with a dread of the unknown, a deep need to know what it is all about. The tavern keeper, the shoe man, the bus driver all expressed this sentiment: "Well, we ought to know about it, shouldn't we? Good or bad--we ought to know!" They don't want to face it--but they know they must.

We are trying to do a service here, and Bob Crowell, too, feels that he is answering a real need.

For your information as to who I am, let me draw a brief sketch. I have taught political science at this institution (with 3 years out for a stretch in the infantry in New Guinea) for 23 years. I have a Ph.D. from Columbia University. I am now a Colonel in the New York Army Nat'l Guard. My books have been in large part college and high school texts, all of them stressing American problems and their political solutions--or the finding of them. My goal has always been an informed and intelligent citizenship--capable of charting and controlling its own future.

Moreover, I am Chairman of Eastern Chapter of Nature Conservancy. Nature Conservancy is the organization which has taken over your property at Quaker Hills to make of it a nature preserve to be protected from exploitation and development. The Beattys and the Gunnisons are well acquainted with me. We write for Harper's Magazine on occasion and for numerous other periodicals. If you find this book worthy you will greatly gratify the hopeful authors. Most sincerely yours,

Dear Mr. Murrow,

We believe that you will be visiting this country during the year and we should like to seize this opportunity cordially to invite you to be a Guest Speaker at a Luncheon organized by the Manchester branch of the English Speaking Union. No doubt you are familiar with the aims and objects of the Union, enjoying as it does wide popularity in the United States as well as Britain. To preserve this essential link the U.S. Consul General for this area serves on the General Committee.

The luncheon proceedings which are informal, usually last from approximately 12.45 p.m. to 2.30 p.m. Out of this the Speaker's allotted time is usually 30/35 minutes.

We are quite sure that you would have something very interesting to relate and the members would be extremely grateful for such an example of Anglo- U.S. co-operation.

Whilst we greatly appreciate that you must have an exceedingly full programme of events, we hope that you might find it possible to consider our invitation.

Yours faithfully,

William Renshaw.

March 5, 1959

Dear Ed,

Now that the tempest has lulled a bit is as good a time as any to say the following.

In my twelve years at CBS I have had the opportunity of working with - for varying lengths of time - most of the great and near great names in the entertainment world, among them yourself.

By my second year, the glamor - for a lad from the mill town of McKeesport, Pa. - working with such people as Lucille Ball and Jack Benny and Arthur Godfrey and Groucho Marx etc., had worn off and I could begin to view them and my job in a more proper perspective. The feet of clay became visible. Their quite human reactions to stresses and strains revealed them to me as just folks whom Fortune and, quite frequently, hard and dedicated work, had elevated to great fame and wealth.

I have known you for more than a decade. I have known you, too, in moments of stress and strain and agonizing decisions. My sober evaluation is that I consider you the finest man I have known. I have a hunch that you don't consider yourself that highly, but I beg leave to point out that in this matter you are not the best of judges.

I regard my years of knowing you and working with you as the most attractive "fringe benefit" of employment at CBS. I have personal regrets that you will not be around for the next year. But, for you, I am filled with pleasure that you (1.) are in a position to take a Sabbatical year, (2.) realize it, and (3.) are actually doing it. I think it is wonderful. I know you will be the gainer. I also know that CBS and the industry as a whole will also benefit greatly from what you and the world do to each other during this next year.

In addition to wishing you and Mrs. Murrow and Casey a healthy and happy odyssey, I also wish for you, not luck, but the best of opportunities. Luck, you don't need. Just opportunities. You'll make your own luck.

When you return, I will be waiting and most eager to resume my work with you. In fact, if, upon your return, a way presents itself to work more closely and directly with you in whatever activities may occupy you at that time - please consider that I have just accepted. Immodestly, Ed, I do have virtues and abilities that my present job makes little or no demands upon. Some day I would like to parade them before you.

May you have a good journey and a safe return.

Best regards,

Beryl

December 22, 1958

Dear Ed:

My congratulations on a courageous job well done. I have just now caught up with your speech before the Association of Radio and Television News Directors at the Chicago Convention. Your speech was a mouthful and it needed saying desperately, and there is no one who could have said it better with the courage, conviction and confidence with which you spoke.

In this morning's press, John Crosby, commenting on the latest Neilsen report, indicates that eight of the top ten spots on television are westerns. This is indeed a sad commentary upon this important communication media at a time when we are engaged in a struggle involving nothing less than our very survival as a free people and as a free nation.

I wonder if your speech has been published in pamphlet form so that it can be given broader circulation in the hope that we can give more people the "itch."

Kindest personal regards and all good wishes for the holiday season.

Press Release

(For release Saturday morning, August 9, 1958)

Sixty-~~four~~ seven college and university teachers yesterday sent President Eisenhower a telegram urging him to continue to press for an immediate Summit Conference and to propose there a bold, new, seven-point program for the Mid-East. The points they suggested include a declaration by the Security Council of support of the independence of all present Mid-East nations; a Security Council ban on the competitive supplying of arms to the Mid-East and restriction on movements of troops and arms in the Mid-East; establishment of a permanent international police force and of an arms control authority; inauguration of a stringless billion-a-year grant in aid and mutual assistance program for Mid-East economic development; and clothing the Secretary General with broad interim authority while the police force is being established.

The signers of the telegram are faculty members of ~~sixteen~~ seventeen colleges and universities and teachers of a wide range of subjects. The signers include lawyers, philosophers and physical scientists, engineers and political scientists, sociologists and economists, psychologists and statisticians, as well as representatives of a number of other fields. They include among other prominent persons two past presidents of the American Economic Association and one past president of the American Statistical Association.

The signers are members of the faculties of the following institutions: Amherst, Buffalo, California, Colorado, Connecticut, Cornell, Goucher, Maryland, Michigan, Mount Holyoke, New Paltz, New School, Northwestern, North Carolina, Oregon, Texas, and Yale.

The telegram was organized by a group of six economists and other social scientists at Cornell University who had sent an earlier telegram to the President protesting the adverse international effects of the landings in Lebanon and Jordan and urging a constructive Mid-East policy. Since the organizers, Professors John A. Brittain, Morris A. Copeland, Douglas F. Dowd, Norman Kaplan, Royal E. Montgomery, and Chandler Morse, were pressed for time, the sixty odd signers are somewhat concentrated--geographically at Cornell and by field in economics.

The organizers are inviting others to join in supporting this seven-point Mid-East program.

A copy of the telegram is attached.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

You once did me the honor of quoting extensively from an article of mine which appeared in the Antioch Review some years ago ("Negotiation from Strength--The Psychological Problem"). The President of my University was deluged with requests for copies, and I subsequently got a dandy raise in salary.

It's time for another raise, so I am enclosing a brief article I have written on "Russian Military Doctrine in the Nuclear Age." Following upon the Kissinger report, a keen interest in this subject has developed throughout the country, and I believe in all sincerity you will find the enclosed well worthwhile. Besides, as I say, it's time for another raise!

RUSSIAN MILITARY DOCTRINE IN THE NUCLEAR AGE

Soviet strategy, doctrine, and military organization is based on the primary assumption that the next major war will not be won with the first blow. According to Russian strategists, World War III will be conducted in two phases: the first, which they call the "crucial phase", will be a massive surprise strategic attack delivered largely from the air, followed by like retaliation. This all-out nuclear assault might decide the war if a nation is not adequately prepared to soften its effect, which the Soviets of course believe they can do. They insist, however, that mutual destruction approaching annihilation does not mean mutual defeat, and that the war will then enter its second and final stage, which the Soviets label the "decisive phase". This will consist of a long, drawn-out war of interdiction, attrition, occupation, and "mopping up", largely fought with tactical weaponry, and with the determining factors being civilian morale and superior land power. During this period of prolonged struggle, Communist-inspired uprisings will take place throughout Eurasia, America's allies will declare their neutrality and eventually shift their allegiance to the USSR, and Russia's submarines, tactical air aim, and short range missile force will throw us back to the western hemisphere and ultimate defeat. They therefore hold strongly to the belief in balanced forces, believing that we over-estimate the importance of surprise attack, strategic air power, and the decisiveness of the first blow. Moreover, they are convinced that we cannot maintain civilian morale like they can, which is another reason they will win once the war enters its protracted "decisive phase". The reasons for our weak mass morale, according to Russian doctrine, are: (1) the exploitive nature of capitalist societies, (2) what Kissinger has called America's "lack of tragic experience", and (3) the mobility of our military, police, and political institutions to enforce rigid civilian discipline. Russia, of course, suffers from none of these shortcomings, and in the end the tough, loyal, disciplined Soviet citizen, in and out of uniform, will win out over his soft, demoralized democratic counterpart.

The Russians believe that precisely because our leaders know this, we prefer a short "one-blow" war, and subsequently we put all our eggs in the SAC basket. The Soviets apparently fear that we will come to rely so greatly on nuclear weapons and sudden attack that we will soon believe we cannot wage war (at least victoriously) in any other way; we must fight a short war with absolute weapons or face defeat. Russian strategists, on the other hand, prefer limited and non-nuclear war, their confidence in Soviet superiority in this type of warfare being akin to the importance they place on the protracted "decisive phase" of total war.

The reader will already have become aware of the similarity between our concept of "limited war" and the Soviet's concept of the "decisive phase" of total war. In view of the recent concern in this country with the inadequacy of our strategic doctrine and military establishment to conduct limited war, it should be apparent that both Russia's doctrine and military forces are superior to ours for this purpose. This becomes all the more apparent when we analyze the structure and role of their military services:

A. Land Power: In Soviet thinking, land power remains the vital and most important weapon in any war, with strategic air-missile power of primary importance only in the first, or "crucial" stage of modern war.

In fact, the Russians seem as concerned with developing tactical missiles for primary use in supporting land operations as they do in achieving strategic inter-continental missiles.

In any major war, it will be the Army's task to protect frontiers and the interior, to hold seized territories, and to police the satellite peoples and Russia's civilian population (especially important during the crucial phase). During this largely defensive phase the Army will stress dispersion, mobility, and reconnaisance, with small bands of troops remaining close to all enemy concentrations to harrass, report, and avoid atomic attack. A military reorganization somewhat similar to our own--along the lines of "pentomic" divisions--has been undertaken to better withstand the crucial first blow. During the second (decisive) stage, attack rather than defense and survival becomes primary; during this stage Russia's superior man power and armored divisions will prove decisive, with the doctrine of victory being (a) penetration of enemy held territory, (b) isolation of enemy strong points, and (c) annihilation of enemy forces.

B. Air Power: Russia's bias in favor of land power and traditional warfare is borne out by their concept of the proper role and function of Air power, which is still viewed largely as a supplement and supporting arm for land and sea operations--especially the former. Two-thirds of their air force is tactical--which they associate with the "decisive" phase of warfare. Its primary missions are to provide adequate transport, support ground operations, intercept enemy air power, and harrass the enemy rear in the battle area. In contrast to these tactical functions, Russia's strategic Air Command has the job of (1) delivering the absolute deterrent during the crucial stage of war, and (2) serving the foreign office during "peace time" as a weapon for what Mr. Dulles has called atomic "diplomatic blackmail". These strategic functions of air power obviously place great reliance on missiles and, interestingly enough, Russia's missile force is under the control of a separate government agency rather than the Ministry of Defense and its military high command. Control of this agency, and hence of the missiles force proper, rests with a group of men, half of whom are professional military officers, and half of whom are civilian politicians. Supposedly this gives the Communist ruling clique (1) more effective use of missile power in political warfare, and (2) control over the ultimate decision to wage all-out atomic war. It must be reiterated in conclusion that Russian military thought does not consider air power as decisive.

C. Sea Power: Russia has been slow to recognize the importance of sea power, and even now their navy is subordinate to the army. Nevertheless the USSR has built a naval force consisting of an estimated 27 cruisers, 25 of which are of post-war vintage, with missile capability; about 150 late model destroyers; 3,500 air craft--land based; and roughly 500 submarines, most of which are good only for coastal defense. The traditional emphasis on defense results in the navy controlling Russia's coastal areas 50 miles inland.

Russian Naval thinking has undergone a transformation since World War II, with greater emphasis being currently placed on the Navy's capacity for interdiction--important in long drawn-out warfare with the United States. Moreover the Navy is increasingly thought of as having a significant strategic role to play. Underwater guided missiles and torpedoes with atomic war heads are being developed, and reportedly Russia is mapping areas of the ocean's floor with a view in mind to establishing permanent underwater sites for missiles bases. Apart from its recent fascination with missiles, however, Russia's navy still retains a posture of defense. The USSR has no battleships, no aircraft carriers, and no seeming concern with amphibious warfare.

To manage its huge military establishment--land, sea, and air--Russia maintains a unified ministry of defense and a single high command largely dominated by Army officers. As mentioned earlier, however, there has recently been established a separate missiles service, under joint political-military control.

The general rule regarding political-military relationships in the defense establishment seems to be strict civilian-party determination of policies, including the role and function of the military. Apart from policy making, however, the military is largely left alone to run its own affairs, free from party or other civilian interference. Russia's officer corps organization and its high command is practically monopolized by Army officers, said to be highly Prussian in their training and outlook. This domination by spokesmen of landpower is evident in every phase of Russian military organization, strategic doctrine, and defense policy. The obvious result has been greater balance and well-rounded capacity to meet any military contingency, ranging from a show of conventional force to total nuclear war.

Dear Mr. Murrow:- IDEA

As there are so varied and many things manufactured, I feel it could be made very interesting to see this medium of Americana. It would be useless to try to name the many phases. But I can think of no more wonderful a thing than to be taken thru a manufacturing plant to see a complete operations. Enclosed is an article that may be of interest. About 30 years ago Henry Ford, produced a few of these in movies.

Richardson, Barton C.

The article titled "Okinawa: Failure or Success?" deals with the political "Alice in Wonderland" atmosphere created by the U. S. military on Okinawa.

It is not an attack upon the U. S. military. It demonstrates, with evidence, how the U. S. military, by trying to "channel" democratic government, built a dead end street and proceeded to smash into it.

According to John Foster Dulles "to get an air base at the price of good will may be a very bad bargain." Today on Okinawa we have an air base and are getting closer to converting good will to ill will. If that happens, it will be a "very bad bargain" indeed.

Since 1945, Okinawa has been under U. S. military administration. The military point of view, for better or worse, has keynoted and defined the United States relationship with Okinawa and its sister islands in the Ryukyus.

Because of the initial error (be it lack of realization or misinterpretation), the people of the Ryukyus were treated as a separate Island people, apart from Japan. At the same time, United States recognized Japan's rights in the Ryukyus in terms of "residual sovereignty".

The Ryukyuans did not feel that they were a separate Island people - they they were exclusively Ryukyuans. They felt they were both Ryukyuans and Japanese (similar to being a Texan and an American) and wished to be treated as part of Japan.

The military point of view on separation of the Ryukyus was more concerned with the dynamics of defense than the dynamics of politics. Defense is the military's business. In terms of the people of the Ryukyus, this underemphasis of political reality has worked against the military and the United States.

The present resistance by ballot that the Ryukyuan people are engaged in cannot be understood if their relationship to Japan is not understood.

The problem of reversion, land, and government are problems (to the Ryukyuans) that belong within the province of U.S.-Japan relationship, not U.S.-Ryukyus relationship. His feeling on this matter is not merely cerebral - it is organic - it is in the bones.

If the United States is to avoid its own version of "Cyprus" on Okinawa, it is going to have to acknowledge and act upon this aspect of political reality. The security of our defense position demands it.

The sooner the U.S. military (characterized by the United States Civil Administration) stops talking to the Ryukyuans like this: "The original copy of the Ordinance (written in English) used the term 'people' and the word 'people' is a collective noun and does not necessarily mean that 'people' stands for 'nationals'" and recognizes that the Ryukyuans do have a national feeling (Japanese) the sooner the United States will be able to move closer to the concept expressed in the Price Report as "showcase for democracy".

The concept of "showcase for democracy" is the concept that Asia is interested in. Our actions on Okinawa are "large beyond measure" in relation to Asia and its acceptance of the United States as more than only a preacher of democracy.

The article examines in detail the feeling of the Ryukyuan people that has found day to day expression in the local Okinawan press.

The writer of this article, a Yankee from New Hampshire, worked on Okinawa as the station manager for a commercial English language music and news radio station. Although the broadcasting was in English language, the station was a Ryukyuan business. The board of directors was Ryukyuan.

The writer lived on the local Ryukyuan economy and not on the military economy. This provided an insight into the Ryukyuan world that could never have been obtained had the writer been working and living within the military community.

The article unfolds step by step how the United States arrived at the position of not being able to have a candidate representing the United States point of view in the Okinawa election on January 12, 1958. It points up the forthcoming Ryukyus-wide election for legislators in March of this year. On the basis of presented evidence, it forwards a plan of action for preventing a "Cyprus" on Okinawa.

It is the writer's belief that the article, with its suggested plan for action, can stand on its own merits.

Mr. Edward R. Murrow

Dear Mr. Murrow:

December tenth, 1958 will mark the Observance of the Tenth Anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights by the United Nations. Recent events which confront us upon the pages of our daily papers indicate it is not an observance to be treated with passing attention. The significant strides the United States has made in recent years in this field are currently clouded over by shocking acts of violence and bigotry. Hundreds of thousands of children are being denied their basic right to adequate education. New forces of anti-semitism are being unleashed. Our position in the eyes of the world as the champion of liberty is at best doubtful. It is most certainly a time for evaluation and careful thought.

I have been asked by Jacob Blaustein, National Chairman for the Observance, to act as chairman of a Tenth Anniversary Dinner commemorating the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, on December ninth, at the grand ballroom of the Waldorf-Astoria. It is a request I feel both honored and obligated to fulfill in view of my own beliefs and convictions.

Knowing of your sympathy and identification with organizations and efforts working to achieve the tenets set forth in the Universal Declaration, I am asking you to serve with me as a sponsor-committee member of the Commemorative Dinner. We are requesting contributions of one hundred dollars from individual sponsors and five hundred dollars from business and organizations. The proceeds of this event will be devoted to the educational program of the American Association for the United Nations for specialized activities relating upon increased acceptance and understanding of the Declaration and its implementation.

In conjunction with the dinner, the AAUN will conduct an all-day conference on Human Rights in New York City on December ninth for heads of national non-governmental organizations, as well as sponsoring a series of similar local programs through its two hundred chapters over the country. Speakers at the dinner will be Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, Secretary-General Dag Hammerskjold, Mrs. Oswald B. Lord and Jacob Blaustein.

I fully realize the many demands upon your time, both professional and philanthropic, but I urge you to consider quietly for a moment the importance of the Declaration before you give me your answer. Your acceptance as an individual sponsor entitles you to two admissions: organizational or business sponsorship includes a table of eight. Your participation in this significant occasion will do much to assure its success. Please make your check to the American Association for the United Nations.

Sincerely yours,

Harold Riegelman

Dear Mr. Murrow:

form letter

Recently a quotation from Frances Maule's book, "Executive Careers for Women," was mailed to you by Shearson, Hammill, and the response has been most gratifying.

I want you to know how willing I would be to talk with you about investment problems. If your portfolio is managed by a Bank or Trust Company, or other advisor, it would mean a great deal to me if you would direct your agent to have such orders placed with Shearson, Hammill & Co., to my attention. Since the services of a broker are required no matter who manages the investments, it would add no extra charge. Needless to say, I shall see to it that any such orders sent to my attention are given careful handling. Experience is all I have to offer, but I do have access to specialists in many fields.

This is a confused time; opposite opinions are expressed by experts and it is difficult to steer a clear course. First quarter earnings will be discouraging but there are certain things that seem to me evident. The Federal debt will not be reduced and may be increased, also the bank reserve requirements may be lowered. Everything will be done to encourage employment. Generally wages will not be cut.

More children are growing up and people live longer. All this, added to the government spending, will mean greater demand and makes for higher prices with a quickened economy. I believe that these facts will lead to an inflation of, say 1% to 3% a year for a long time.

A Chartist in whose finding we have confidence thinks chemicals will be the first group to advance in a recovery market; missiles and electronics will follow. Utilities in growing territories should do well.

Of course, certain stocks will go up or down against all reason, but it is a rare person who has the gift of timing.

Very sincerely yours,

INTRODUCTION

This modest volume came about as a result of my desire for self expression. The poems reflect my attitude toward race consciousness as a person, not a poet. Poetry is the means by which I seek to examine the world around me. Perchance to Dream, Othello, is the impression that Harlem made upon me. Othello speaks for me quite naturally, but his voice is not altogether mine, it is an echo from what I like to call 'a new generation.' A generation tired of apologies and colored or Negro 'fogieisms,' which have no place in a world of sputniks. Culture is the key, cultivation the dangerous curve by which we often neglect to slow down for. I am proud of my heritage as a Negro, but I don't have to accept or like some of its shallowness; nor be complacent about certain inadequacies, socially, economically and politically. Harlem is the symbol by which I submit my criticism, cultivation and less self-consciousness is the solution free versely offered.

My thanks to the editors of: The American Weave, The A.M.E. Church Review, Circles Magazine, The Anthology of College Poetry, The Ohio Poetry Review, and Signet for publishing many of the poems used in this volume. To Miss Yvonne Walker and Miss Geraldine E. Jackson, English professors at Wilberforce University, a special note of appreciation. To Miss Jackson, I am greatly indebted for editing this manuscript, and guiding my unskilled hand toward perfection. To Miss Walker goes my eternal gratitude for bidding me to sing during songless days. I would also like to express my appreciation to Langston Hughes Casper L. Jordan, my Uncle Mack and B.J. for faith.

And then God saw that the heavens glistened, the waters ran true to course,
And the stars smiled upon the greeness of his man and the earth of his hands.
Then God touched all the waters of the world bringing forth a tear, knowing
The forbidden fruit would guide man's soul to fear. Then God said tear and sorrow blend.
And thrust his mighty arm against a backdrop of white cloistered stars
Then God said, 'Adam I have given you the breath of life,

Then God said nothing more,
And the elements spoke for him, the fish and fowl harmonized his silence into An inconceivable melody for man's ear, and God was pleased, and man found out
How to cry, he discovered his hopelessness and hurt tearfully real.
Then God
walked to the ends of his earth and turned his back, the shadows of fear fell upon his tracks, and like the silver wings of winter, the coldness of his concern
Brought forth snow, and that snow tear of universal sorrow capped the mountains.

Night Song

while life pasess through all our hopes and dreams, leaving shadowless phanthoms creeping into our silent room.
Finding us mellow and lonely, still questioning our lives not totally shallow, but anxious to sleep, to forget it all; labor numbed eyes stare into the ceiling that will not come down to smash futility's tired pawn.

Because love is a broken record playing upon our weaknesses, and we content our sorrow by friendly games of cards and late, late shows.
Night tells me to love and never forget those quick moments.

Because tomorrow creates a song for you even before the passing of this day.
I know that life is more than work and song, it has no meaning

And out of nothingness grasp one thing of beauty or purpose,

Pasternak—A Fool Who Tells Truth

I Do Not Retract One Word Of 'Dr. Zhivago,' Novelist Says

Scripps-Howard staff writer Henry N. Taylor has obtained an exclusive interview with Nobel prize-winning novelist Boris Pasternak at the Russian writer's home.

Mr. Taylor saw Pasternak alone for 45 minutes on Feb. 8—before the latest controversy developed over a new Pasternak poem. Mr. Taylor's uncensored interview—filed as soon as he left the Soviet Union this week—puts into perspective Pasternak's philosophical attitude toward his difficulties with the Soviet state over his book, "Dr. [illegible] also shows his concern about [illegible] caused for him by people [illegible]

By HENRY N. TAYLOR,
Scripps-Howard Newspapers.

PEREDELKINO, U.S.S.R., Feb. 18.—"In every generation there has to be some fool who will speak the truth as he sees it," Boris Pasternak said.

"I do not retract a word of 'Dr. Zhivago.'

"I am grateful in my heart that the world is reading it.

"At the same time, I understand why it has not been published in Russia and I do not expect it to be. There would be much misunderstanding now."

Pasternak, 68, with a splash of white hair that makes him look a bit like Carl Sandburg, talked with me for 45 minutes in his brown board farmhouse—in a birch forest 40 minutes' ride from Moscow. (Pasternak speaks English.) The house is reached over a snow-packed lane.

His friends were afraid Pasternak would lose his house when "Mr. Zhivago" won the Nobel Prize and Soviet critics began calling him a "parasite." The house is in a writers' colony belonging to the Writers Union from which Pasternak has been expelled. But he is still here.

"There have been troubles," Pasternak said. "But I feel the tempest is passing now. I have my home and my family and my freedom. I have hundreds of wonderful letters from abroad. But also there are some which create problems for me."

The Taylor interview with Pasternak took place a few days before the London Daily Mail published a poem which the poet wrote during the peak of the controversy over "Dr. Zhivago."

(The poem opens with the line: "I am lost like a beast in an enclosure. . . ." It closes with: "And I believe the time will come when the spirit of good will will conquer wickedness and infamy."

(Pasternak has accused Daily Mail correspondent Anthony Brown of violating a confidence. He says he gave the poem to Mr. Brown not for publication but for delivery to a friend in Paris.

Reds Send Agent to Plot Kurd Uprising in Iraq

Edited by NED ROCHON.

(From United Press International and Associated Press)

Wednesday, Feb. 18, 1959.

The Kremlin has sent the Syrian Communist leader Khalad Bakdash into Iraq for the specific mission of organizing a nationalist uprising among the Kurd tribes. Bakdash arrived in Baghdad last week from Moscow, direct from the 21st Soviet Communist party congress. Iraq has become the leading center of communism in the Middle East since the overthrow of the monarchy last year by the present premier, Gen. Abdel Karim Kassem.

Trouble From Abroad.

Some of Pasternak's troubles are provoked by well-meaning but uninformed persons abroad.. For example, during myinterview, Pasternak shoved a typed page across his desk for me to see.

It was from Jose Villalonga, an anti-Communist Spanish writer living in Paris. He invited Pasternak to up. A policeman warned him to lie still until an ambulance came to take his to Beekman-Downtown.

At first the boy was thought to have escaped, miraculously, with only fractures of both arms. But as a seven-man team of surgeons began a three-and-a-half-hour operation that ended at 10:30 p.m., the full extent of his injuries was revealed.

The boy's liver was badly torn. Damage to the intestines and internal bleeding was extensive. "It's up to God," a surgeon said later.

Led Into Room.

As James came out of anesthesia in a hushed fourth-floor ward, Mr. and Mrs. Bell, both 38, were led into the room. A priest, the Rev. Gilbert S. Avery of St. Augustine's Chapel of the Trinity Episcopal Parish, spoke soft words of comfort.

James was an altar boy at the chapel, his parents loyal parishioners. They have seven other children.

As Mrs. Bell reached her son's bed, she clasped her hands and prayed, almost inaudibly. She shook with sobs.

'I Don't Blame Her.'

Mr. Bell tried to comfort her with reason. "My wife is blaming herself," he said. "But I don't blame her. Sometimes you have to chastise a child.

"He was always a little delicate. I guess we spoiled him a little, and he took criticism too hard."

Then reason gave way to anguish. "If only he lives," the father whispered. "If only he lives."

Brush Fire Whips Across Texas

Associated Press.

EASTLAND, Tex., Feb. 18.—Wind-whipped flames which have blackened 5000 acres of grass and brush continued a steady march across pasture and north and east of here today.

It was the biggest of half-a-dozen fires breaking out in this part of west central Texas yesterday. No loss of life or serious damage was reported.

Coming Events Today

BECK CASE GOING TO JURY.

Special to World-Telegram and Sun.

TACOMA, Wash., Feb. 18.—A jury of eight men and four women gets the task today of deciding whether Dave Beck was a shrewd, millionaire, labor chief who cheated on income taxes or an overworked man, careless with figures and too-busy to handle his own account books. Both characters have been outlined in closing arguments of the 60-day tax evasion trial.

IKE TO FLY SOUTH.

United Press International.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 18.—President Eisenhower flies south today for two days of shirt-sleeve diplomacy with President Adolfa Lopez Mateos of Mexico. Gen. Eisenhower will spend tomorrow and Friday as the guest of President Lopez Mateos in Acapulco, beach resort. Their discussions of major problems were expected to be informal and of a general nature.

INSURANCE VOTE DUEL.

United Press International.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 18.—The House prepared today to pass a controversial bill that would levy $226 million a year in additional income taxes on the life insurance industry. The Treasury-backed measure appeared to have a good chance of passage, despite the industry's argument any additional tax bite might mean lower dividends for policyholders or higher premium rates.

VIRGINIA SCHOOL OPENS.

Special to World-Telegram and Sun.

FRONT ROYAL, Va., Feb. 18.—The locks come off the doors today at Warren County High School in compliance with a court order to abolish racial segregation by opening the school to 24 Negro students. When the bell rings at the county's only high school for the first time in nearly nine months, few, if any, white students are expected to be on hand.

MURDER CASE NEARS JURY.

Special to World-Telegram and Sun.

PATERSON, Feb. 18.—The 22-day-old trial of Paul and Eugene Fitzsimmons, brothers accused of killing Passaic Patrolman Robert Strone, 28, last May 8, was expected to go to the jury today.

Worried Dad, 2 Sons Found Dead in Auto

United Press International.

MIDDLETOWN, Del., Feb. 18.—A brooding father was reported today to have killed himself and his two young sons in his auto because of fears he would lose them in a custody battle with his estranged wife.

Police said the father, Clarence M. Sapp, 35, of Middletown, took the lives of his boys, Donald, 10, and Richard, 8, and himself by running the exhaust pipe into the automobile.

A muskrat trapper, William K. Morrow, discovered the bodies yesterday in the carbon monoxide-filled auto parked in a rural area.

Mr. Morrow told police he found the auto with the motor running and Mr. Sapp sitting behind the wheel. Mr. Murrow said the older boy was curled up on the front seat and appeared to be sleeping. The younger boy was stretched out on the back seat.

Investigators said Mr. Murrow smashed a window and shut off the motor after discovering the rubber hose attached to the exhaust pipe.

With regard to the attached, I made it quite clear to Mr. Robinson's secretary that you did not wish to do any recording, but would be pleased to see Mr. Robinson for a social chat. She had intimated that he wanted to see you about speaking for an organization he was interested in, and I had also expressed doubt that you would do that but told her that he and you could discuss it when you met for your chat.

Dear Jackie:

Many thanks for yours of February 11. I always enjoy chatting with you so much that it did not occur to me that we had any business to transact.

This is written just before I leave for a couple of weeks in Florida and shortly after I get back I must go to London for ten days. Let's talk again sometime in April, when things may be a little less hectic.

Dear Ed:

It was nice seeing you yesterday, but I feel that I walked out of your office with the main purpose of the visit not being realized.

A few days ago, I talked with your secretary regarding the possibility of your doing a taped recording for my radio show. She informed my secretary that while you were reluctant about doing this type of show, you would like to talk with me about it. We therefore set the appointment for yesterday.

It seems that during our visit we talked about everything else but - and I had the feeling after leaving that we were each waiting for the other to bring up the subject of the purpose of my visit. Frankly, I was somewhat embarrassed because the appointment was set up for me by your office.

Knowing what a very busy man you are, Ed, I feel embarrassed about having taken up so much of your time without accomplishing what I thought was the reason for my visit.

With kindest regards, I remain

Jan. 10, 1958

Dear Mr. Murrow,

I am a senior at the Univ. of Penna. and am currently in the midst of my thesis on "Radio and Television Education in the United States". I would like to work out a mature program of courses for the University, which, I fear, is far behind in this aspect of Journalism or Communications education.

I would like to know if you, as an individual, feel that a person can be educated for the Radio and Television industry. Is there really a need for young people? How would you suggest preparing people for the jobs available? I most certainly appreciate any ideas or suggestions you may have.

Your time for interviews is, understandably, little, however much I'd like to talk to you personally. If you find you might have 15 minutes or so some day, I'd like the chance to talk to you.

Radio and Television are awfully important, considering their impact on people, institutions, and the home. I'd be most interested in your ideas on the education of people for the industry.

Thank you for your letter of March 26th.

I shall be delighted to join you as an associate chairman of the Person-to-Person United Jewish Appeal. I hope it will be possible for me to attend the breakfast meeting on May 22nd to launch the Person-to-Person drive, but there is just the possibility that I may have to be out of the country at that time. I shall have to let you know definitely later on.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

The work of the United Jewish Appeal in saving the lives of uprooted and persecuted people and helping them make a fresh start in the United States, Israel and other free lands is of tremendous importance to everyone. I therefore feel deeply honored to serve for the period from May twenty-second to June twenty-sixth as chairman of the Person-to-Person effort of the United Jewish Appeal. It would be most gratifying to me personally, as well as in my capacity as chairman, if I could count on you to serve with me for this same period as an Associate Chairman of this special aspect of the campaign.

The Person-to-Person effort will consist of a series of Tuesday and Thursday telephone solicitation sessions, starting Thursday, May twenty-second and continuing through June twenty-sixth. Business and community leaders will come to these meetings to make calls for the campaign to people they know. I am sure that if you were to sign a letter of invitation to such a group for one of the Tuesday or Thursday dates and be at U.J.A. headquarters yourself for a short period to greet those who attend, the response will be very encouraging. The U.J.A. headquarters will provide you with a list of names of the business and community leaders for your approval. This is all you will be asked to do.

Of course, I would be delighted if you also find it possible to attend the breakfast meeting on May twenty-second to launch the Person-to-Person drive and the one on June twenty-sixth concluding the program.

I do hope you will find it possible to join in this effort.

With best wishes,

Your participation in the Person-to-Person campaign for the United Jewish Appeal has contributed so much to its success that I want to take this opportunity to express my personal appreciation to you.

Of the nearly $5,000,000 raised by the United Jewish Appeal during the past month, more than $1,250,000 was obtained by volunteers working at UJA headquarters. You must feel great satisfaction, as I do, at the knowledge that the efforts of this campaign will mean so much to the tens of thousands who depend on UJA for their very survival.

Although my period of Service as chairman of the Person-to-Person campaign has ended, my interest in the success of the United Jewish Appeal will remain as strong as ever, as I am sure your interest will. The officers of United Jewish Appeal join me in expressing warmest thanks.

Because of the fact that the farm is located some little distance away from the more populated centers, we are enclosing a sketch map of the area, a partial list of available over-night facilities, and other helpful information relating to travel to Winrock. For the convenience of those who will be traveling some little distance the day of the sale, we have arranged with a caterer from Little Rock to serve lunch at the farm at a reasonable price. Food service will start at 11:00 a.m.

March 6, 1958

Dear Mr. Muhlhauser:

I understand that my friend Newell Rogers has filed an application for a post with the Salzburg Seminar in American Studies.

I have known Mr. Rogers for twenty years and have confidence in his ability to do well at any task he may undertake. He is an honest, capable, and sensitive reporter. I have never attended the Salzburg Seminar but have talked with a number of people who have. I am sure that Mr. Rogers capabilities plus his knowledge of Europe and Europeans and his adaptability would make him an excellent candidate for any post the Seminar has to offer.

TO E.R.M.

February 10, 1958

Dear Ed:

Please ignore my letter of February 4th if it has not reached your eye or you have not yet had time to do anything about it.

For I have a new favor to ask, and I cannot put you to so much trouble in my behalf. Do you know by chance any of the directors on the list enclosed?

I'm a feller who needs a friend who knows one or more, and will write to him or them in behalf of an application I have filed with the executive vice-president, Frederick P. Muhlhauser for a job with the Salzburg Seminar in American Studies. One job is coming vacant now; another later.

It would be a fascinating piece of work for a privately run outpost of American culture and life. And it seems highly worth doing.

Or alternatively if you cared to write Mr. Muhlhauser, whose address is 17 Dunster Street, Cambridge, 38, Mass. It is a question of my competence, personality, adaptability and stamina in dealing with the Europeans who attend lectures and seminars on aspects of American life, and with the university faculty members who go over to give the lectures. The Europeans are men and women between 23 and 35 from the free countries, who are apt to become or are leaders in communications or the professions.

Thanks, Ed, if you do find time to drop a note to a director, if you know any one of them, or to Muhlhauser.

As ever,

Newell

Dear Ed:

Bill Morrell told me you had recklessly offered anew to help me sell myself into economic slavery.

I have had two thoughts on which you perhaps could give me advice or aid. I am not sure that either is very good, and I'll understand if you take a poor view of both:

1) The one important man in the Foundation field that I have not been able to approach for an interview is Arnold Zurcher at the International Institute for Education. Would there be any point from his standpoint or mine in trying to see him? Could you arrange it for me? (You may have made this approach many months ago on my behalf.)
2) With my age and previous condition of servitude, should I apply to C.B.S. itself for a job in the public relations or press relations office? (What a pity CBS doesn't have a few broadcasting stations in Britain! It would be good for the BBC and for me, and I might then be good for CBS.)

If it is simpler for you to telephone me your reaction, my home number is Washington, Conn., Underhill 8-2615. I hate even to write this note--knowing what pressure you live under. But now I've done it and thanks for your forbearance.

Dear Mr. Rogers:

Earl Gammons was good enough to pass on to me your letter of June 12th together with the suggestion sent by Mr. Arnold.

There is only one PERSON TO PERSON program scheduled before the end of this season, and we are already committed to guests for that one. However, Arthur Godfrey will be doing the program next season and I am, therefore, passing your suggestion along to him.

Sincerely yours,

Dear Earl:

I am sure you will remember Jim Arnold, and I am enclosing herewith a letter I have just received from him in which he suggests that I contact you with regard to having Ed Murrow consider interviewing Bill Graham. Enclosed also is a folder Jim enclosed in his letter.

I dropped Joe Ream a note on this but I thought you might have some suggestions that I should follow in this regard.

Best personal regards.

Dear Paul,

With the 400,000 things you have got to do each day, this may be just the straw that breaks the camel's back. But I do hope not.

Last night I was at the Board of Stewards meeting and while talking with Doyle, he mentioned his recent trip to New York and Washington and the good time that you and he had playing at Burning Tree. It certainly brought back a wonderful memory to me of the day you and I played along with Earl Gamson.

I know Earl has retired, but do you think there would be any possibility of speaking to him about trying to contact Edward R. Murrow to suggest that Bill Graham, President of Private Enterprise, Inc. be considered for Murrow's PERSON-TO-PERSON program?

As you know, I am very much enthused about this idea of Private Enterprise, Inc. and trying to sell it around the world -- doing something positive for private enterprise rather than being constantly on the defensive against Communism.

Bill Graham is a terrific man about 46, with a charming wife and six handsome children. He started out with positively nothing when he was graduated from Northwestern. He borrowed two hundred dollars and has made a great success in the oil and real estate business. He is now devoting his full time to Private Enterprise, Inc. and is just the sort of fellow I believe Edward R. Murrow would like to hear about.

Enclosed is another READERS DIGEST article, along with one that appeared in TIME concerning Bill Graham. If you think it merits consideration, I would appreciate anything you might be able to do.

When are you coming home? I certainly hope you will have some time off and will let us afford you a relaxing evening at 245 Dunbar Road.

Please give my best to Nell and Sarah Jane.

Sincerely,

Fanning a Flame

When Kansas Millionaire Bill Graham tried to spark a brush fire for capitalism in socialist-minded India last summer (TIME, Aug. 12), the government poured on cold water. Finance Minister T. T. Krishnamachari and others refused to see him. But last week Graham's dream of financing capital-starved entrepreneurs ("The small guy who's on the ball") and making a profit to boot had become too important to ignore. When Graham landed in India with funds raised from free-enterprising Americans, Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru himself sat down with the tireless enterpriser for a half-hour's talk and wished him all success. Krishnamachari not only approved, but last week eased import restrictions on needed machinery for Graham projects and promised that all profits could be taken out of India.

The reason for the turnabout was plain. India is now desperate for foreign capital and sees in Graham a chance to show good will toward investors. On Graham's part, there had been nothing but good will and hard work since last summer. Fervently talking up his dream back in the U.S., Graham collected $250,000 from fascinated investors ranging all the way from the Rockefellers' International Basic Economy Corp. ($25,000) to an oil worker who offered $5,000 in $100 monthly installments and formed Private Enterprises Inc.

Money-Sucking Sands. On his way to India, Graham not only picked up two more $100 checks from pilots in mid-air, but planted some free-enterprise seeds along the way. In Athens he left $10,000 with a committee of bankers for local loans, another $6,200 in Istanbul and $10,000 in Beirut. Already approved are loans to a Greek furniture company, a Turkish spring-clip factory, a Lebanese cement contracting business. He landed in India with $220,000 left in hand and a lot more enterprise in mind.

Don Connery

BILL GRAHAM & INDIAN BUSINESSMAN
Out of big deals, little dreams.

In two weeks he trebled his capital. Indian Banker G. D. Birla, whom Graham met in San Francisco at the International Industrial Development Conference (TIME, Oct. 28), made good on a promise to match the capital in rupees. Another Indian millionaire promised an additional $200,000 in rupees; two textile magnates raised $25,000 more. Indian Industrialist J. R. D. Tata, owner of 25-company Tata enterprises (TIME, Sept. 30), is expected to come in soon.

But to put all the money to work without throwing it away was another story. As Banker Birla put it: "Any fool can make money in the U.S., but to make money in India is an art. India is like the sands of the desert, where money can disappear like water." Because only "some success stories" can really get his crusade moving, Graham now believes that he must focus on bigger deals first before he can make the thousands of little ones he dreams of. In Bombay he put up $20,000 to match $20,000 in rupees from Textileman P. N. Kejriwal, who wants to build a nylon hosiery plant.

Change of Plan. To beef up the original plan of sharing capitalization and profits fifty-fifty with small borrowers, Graham has switched to 50% from an entrepreneur, 25% from a wealthy Indian (both in rupees) and 25% in dollars from Private Enterprises Inc. On the committee of Indian bankers and businessmen who screen the loans, this has the effect of more help to enterprises in which they have a chief interest. But bigger deals will persuade more big businessmen to put up more matching rupees, get them in on the crusade.

Whatever the outcome, Bill Graham plans to haunt India next year to make sure that enterprises are started and properly run. Said he fervently: "We're going to light a fire under these Indians. Whatever happens, at least we'll find out whether or not they really want our help."

SERVING THE INDUSTRIAL HEART OF AMERICA

December 30, 1958

The Honorable Anastas I. Mikoyan
Deputy Premier
The Kremlin
Moscow, U.S.S.R.

My dear Sir:

With reference to my cable message, this will reiterate my most cordial invitation to you and your party to be my guests during your proposed visit to the United States.

It has been variously reported in the news that your visit would encompass, besides matters of state, a vacation and an interest in the chemical industry. Should your time for vacation permit, I respectfully urge that you see the scenic beauties of mountainous West Virginia and the majestic spectacle of the great Ohio River. Populated by a hearty people with a rugged spirit of independence, West Virginia's vast mineral riches have made of it one of the world's great centers of chemical manufacturing. The Charleston area alone contains a complex of chemical industry unsurpassed in diversity and production. In addition, much of this burgeoning industry - based upon limitless stores of coal and natural gas - is made possible by the huge output of electrical energy in the many coal-fed steam-generating plants located in our river valleys.

All of this peaceful industrial might is the product of free private enterprise, with neither the supervision nor the interference of the Federal or State governments. The prosperity of our people, in terms of food, shelter, clothing, and transportation, speaks eloquently for itself. And their individual productivity, using tools provided by private capital, is what makes our industry and output unsurpassed.

In Huntington you will find the most beautiful city of West Virginia, located at the junction of three states and boasting - besides widely diversified industry - Marshall College, an institution of higher learning with an enrollment of 5,000, and other centers of culture, entertainment, recreation, and commerce.

Personally, I am what is described as a small businessman. I am engaged as an employee in a direction of a private corporation employing over one hundred skilled technicians, creative and sales people, operating radio broadcasting stations in both Charleston and Huntington, and a single television station which serves both metropolitan centers from a mid-point between them. Our coverage area includes parts of West Virginia, Ohio, Kentucky, and Virginia, and reaches the homes of well over half a million families, each with its own television receiver. This, too, is a completely private enterprise, using radio frequencies assigned by license from the United States government. It is a fiercely competitive business, as a result of which all our people may receive programming of entertainment, cultural, and current events nature from widely divergent viewpoints through a multiplicity of outlets. We are also identified through common ownership with Huntington's daily newspapers. These newspapers and their subsidiaries were operated continuously for sixty-three years, until his death this week, by their founder, a great patriot sprung from humble beginnings, Joseph Harvey Long.

The bulk of our population, strangely enough, is rural; and those who are not engaged in manufacturing and commerce, are engaged in farming. The Central Ohio Valley area is an inspiring example of the peaceful prosperity of free individuals, each pursuing his livelihood and the development of his family according to his own conscience and within the framework of local governments which are the expression of the majority of the people.

It is only fair to point out my passionate devotion to this way of life and to the essential dignity and indispensability of the individual.

The living example of our people in their daily existence tells more eloquently than any official government policy the peaceful intent of all Americans, as well as the awesome potential of their cooperative efforts in free association. It was in the spirit of this example that I issued this invitation, together with my greetings for the New Year.

Respectfully,

Lawrence H. Rogers II

Dear Ed:

When I worked with you and the others there, I was well aware that I was with the best. Certainly recent events have not changed that.

It was wonderful of you to take the time to cut the promos for me. And you were more than kind in the things you said. It made a big hit here and will be a tremendous help to me starting out in a new market.

We're getting things into shape for our opening shot on the 30th -- a seemingly impossible task.

I know you'll appreciate the job I have ahead of me. The other two ten o'clock shows here run about 95% blood, gore, minor fires, etc. with barely a nod to the national and international news of importance. While I realize the importance of presenting the GOOD local news, I want to hit the national and world news harder and in depth. This, I fear, will take a bit of educating.

Ed, I hope you get a good rest during your year away from the studios. You certainly need and deserve it, even though your nightly shows will be sorely missed.

Thanks again for all you've done for me. And if your travels bring you through the Southwest, please lets bend an elbow and talk a bit.

Dear Ed,

Here are the newspapers which you requested. The boys seem to have done a pretty good job on it. The general reaction at the convention was about the same as yours -- that WMBD pulled a boner by the blackout. Incidentally, I ran the string out Sunday night by congratulating, on the air, this same CBS opposition on winning two awards at the convention. No reaction from them on that.

It was wonderful to see you again, Ed. I feel guilty that I hung around so long when you had other things (such as sleep) to do. But it was so good just to sit and talk with you. Hope we can do it again soon.

My regards to Kay, Eddie and the rest of your staff.

I may have a clue for you about that Jewish Temple Bombing. I just read a piece in last inter (evening Peoria) paper titled "Peoria's Bow on C.B.S. If ~~was~~ could be either the T.V. camera operator that blacked it out, or the one who told him to black it out is your man, mebby. Or if not then he knows who did it, mebby a friend or friends of his, and was paid to keep it a secret. Why don't you go up & see them, but please don't use or publish my name or address. I sure can use that reward of $1000. as I'm still not working. Any way that's the way that story I read looks to me.

U. N. Chief Proposes Peace Force

Plans Short Of What Ike Suggested

United Nations, N. Y. (UPI) — Secretary-General Dag Hammarskjold today outlined plans for a U.N. "peace force." He said it would never be used in combat operations or be involved in internal conflicts.

Hammarskjold's rules and principles for the use and recruitment of a U.N. peace force were based on the experience of U. N. emergency forces now on duty in the Gaza strip and observer groups in Lebanon.

THE QUESTION of a stand-by peace force, suggested by President Eisenhower on Aug. 13, was expected to be debated by the 81-nation special political committee at the end of next week.

Hammarskjold appeared to fall short of Eisenhower's call for "a force in being" to give beset countries "prompt and effective action to help safeguard their independence."

The Soviet Union has announced its opposition to any stand-by peace force.

HAMMARSKJOLD said that the plans must be kept 'flexible" to deal with each emergency situation as it arises.

He suggested a paramilitary force which would strike only in self-defense. Recruits would be volunteers, but would not include the forces of any of the five permanent Security Council members of the countries involved in a dispute.

It would be recruited only with the consent of countries contributing forces or materiel and would be sent into a danger area only with the consent of the country involved.

IT WOULD be sent into action only by the Security Council or the General Assembly; ultimate decisions on operations would be left to the secretary-general.

Costs would be met by the U.N. budget.

The U.N. charter provides for an international police force, but no such group has been brought into being because of the failure of Russia and the West to agree on its composition.

The United Nations three times has resorted to makeshift arrangements—in Korea, in the short-lived Suez war of 1956, and in Lebanon.

Search Saves Men Sold Poison To Wash Dishes

Tokyo, (UPI) — Seven Japanese sailors narrowly escaped death today when they learned the caustic soda they were about to use for washing their dishes was really deadly potassium cyanide poison.

A frantic air and sea search saved the men, who could not be reached from shore.

The search began when a druggist sold the sailors 2,000 grams of the fast-acting poison by mistake. He had meant to give them four cans of caustic soda for dish-washing.

The druggist quickly called the owners of the 118-ton Kofuku Maru but the supply ship already was at sea and could not be reached by radio because her wireless operator was ill and had to remain ashore.

A fishing vessel reached the ship earlier today and averted a tragedy.

Tunisia Breaking With UAR

Tunis, (UPI)—Tunisia decided today to break off diplomatic relations with the United Arab Republic, the Tunisian information ministry reported.

The break followed a clash between the Tunisian and U. A. R. delegations at the current Arab League council session in Cairo. Tunisia charged last Saturday that the U.A.R. was "interfering in our internal affairs" and that "all co-operation between the two states has become practically impossible.

WORD OF the break spread fast after UAR Ambassador M. Falemi called this morning on Sadok Mokkadem, Tunisian secretary of state for foreign affairs.

Falemi told reporters afterward he was notified that relations would be broken.

The Tunisian government first refused to comment on this, but this afternoon the information ministry confirmed that the break had been decided on.

President Habib Bouguiba was expected to explain the break tonight before national constituent assembly.

ONE SPECIFIC reason for the break is Egypt's sheltering of Salah Ben Youssef, colleague of Bourguiba during Tunisia's fight for independence, but now an exile in Cairo.

He is under sentence of death in Tunisia for plotting against Bourguiba. UAR President Gamal Abdel Nasser has given him asylum.

Air Mishaps Fatal To Three

Honolulu, (AP)—Two Air Force jet fighter planes ran low on fuel over the Pacific Tuesday and the pilot of one died when he bailed out 90 miles northeast of here.

Two Marine helicopter crewmen were killed when their chopper blew up in the rescue operation.

Six supersonic, swept-wing F101 Voodoos were ferrying to Honolulu from McClellan AFB, Calif., where a spokesman said they had refueled Tuesday morning after a hop from Langley AFB, Va. One of them radioed he was running out of fuel.

A KC50 tanker and two rescue planes were sent out. Due to air turbulence, the Air Force said, connections could not be made for the aerial refueling and the pilot ejected in what appeared to be a normal bailout.

But he was found dead, floating in his inflated life jacket, by one of two Marine helicopters on the rescue mission.

U. S. Trying For Cut In Forces On Quemoy

Washington, (AP)—The United States is trying to persuade Nationalist China to withdraw some troops from its offshore islands even though officials here see little chance of negotiating a Formosa settlement with Red China.

The line of U. S. action is apparent in statements made by Secretary of State Dulles at a news conference Tuesday.

His remarks also added up to saying that this is a very delicate operation for the United States. Should it press Nationalist China too hard, the Chinese Reds might gain in their objective of driving a wedge between the United States and the Nationalist government on Formosa, which controls the Quemoy and Matsu islands off the Chinese mainland.

DULLES urged that the Quemoy crisis and other current aspects of foreign policy be kept out of political debate. He called on both Democratic and Republican politicians to "calm down." At one point, in replying to questions, he said in effect that both a weekend statement by the 24-member Democratic Advisory Council and a reply by Vice President Nixon had gone beyond the bounds of what he considers proper.

Dulles denied that the United States has any plans whatever for urging nationalist China to reduce its military strength on Quemoy now that the Communists have extended their seven-day truce there for an additional two weeks.

He added, however, that "no doubt there are discussions that are going on" now on Formosa between U.S. Secretary of Defense Neil McElroy and others as to the most useful disposition of Nationalist forces.

He then drew a sharp line between urging Nationalist President Chiang Kai-shek to cut down on his forces for military reasons and for political reasons—that is, in order to move toward some kind of agreement to avoid conflict with the Communists.

DULLES SAID the military question simply is whether it is more effective to have Chiang's forces deployed "in their present numbers on Quemoy and Matsu or to have a greater number on Formosa, which would have greater flexibility and greater range of action under certain contingencies—and they could go back to Quemoy if the necessity came."

He also spoke of the "military question" of reducing manpower and increasing the striking power of the remaining troops on the off-shore islands.

The Nationalists have openly opposed any troop withdrawal, but reports from Formosa indicated they may be resigned to the idea of fewer troops equipped with better weapons.

Bomb Probe Turns Up Anti-Semitic Pamphlets

By D. F. BRINKMAN
Journal Star Staff Writer

Police and federal authorities today were trying to determine whether there is any connection between yesterday's bombing of Anshai Emeth Temple, 521 NE Monroe st., and the distribution last week of anti-Semitic pamphlets in front of the synagogue.

Bernard J. Kennedy, chief of police, was disinclined to attach any real significance to the circulation of the pamphlets, but the angle was not being disregarded.

He said a woman had turned three of the pamphlets over to him. She said they were being distributed in front of the temple by a couple of men.

All bitterly directed against the Jews, the pamphlets, which have been turned over to the Federal Bureau of Investigation, bore the titles: "They Got the Blame," "Jews in American Wars," and "Americans All."

Kennedy said he is positive that the bombing here was not

Peoria's Bow On CBS News Blacked Out

For the first time in the history of Peoria television a local TV newscaster was aired on a national network reporting from Peoria last night—but as the network news containing this Peoria report went throughout the nation it was blacked out in Peoria itself.

Richard Roll, WTVH news director, filmed an interview with Mayor Eugene Leiter on the Anshai Emeth Temple bombing at the request of CBS news, which film was quickly flown to Chicago and cut in on the 6:15 p.m. Douglas Edwards nation-wide newscast over the CBS network.

Peoria's CBS station, WMBD-TV, posted a "network trouble" sign during the Richard Roll report and restored the network promptly after he had finished. His film report was 1 minute and 15 seconds in length. The "network trouble" was the same 1 minute and 15 seconds.

Roll, regular newscaster for the rival WTVH, now has the distinction of being the first Peoria TV newsman to make a national network report from Peoria.

Ike Calls Bombings Work Of Hoodlums

Washington (AP) — President Eisenhower today angrily characterized those responsible for bombings of places of worship as hoodlums of the Al Capone and Babyface Nelson type.

At a news conference the President spoke out vigorously against the dynamiting of Jewish temples in Atlanta, Ga., and Peoria.

He did so after a reporter told him that some of those responsible apparently have been privately identifying themselves as members of a "Confederate underground."

ADDRESSING himself to that description, Eisenhower said that from babyhood he has been taught to respect the southern Confederacy of Civil War days.

Then he said that for hoodlums to describe themselves as any part of the Confederacy is a complete insult.

They should be described, he added angrily, as Al Capones and Babyface Nelsons, and that kind of hoodlum.

On other subjects the President sharply criticized the involvement of American foreign policy in politics.

He said that he agreed with former President Truman that foreign policy should be kept out of the election year battles between the two parties.

Eisenhower told a press conference that he realized the inevitability of charge and counter-charge during a political campaign but that he still deplored partisan quarreling over foreign policy.

EISENHOWER also said the United States is not going to try to coerce Chiang Kai-shek into reducing his Chinese Nationalist forces on Quemoy and the other off-shore islands.

He strongly indicated, however, that the United States would welcome a voluntary reduction by the Chinese Nationalists. He said that he had made no secret that he thought Chiang had too many troops there.

The President was asked at his news conference whether this country was seeking to persuade Chiang to remove some of his troops from the off-shore islands.

Eisenhower replied that he felt it was not logical to have so much military manpower there but added that the United States was not going to try to coerce an ally on something the ally believed vital to his very existence.

—HE INDICATED that he felt preliminary plans for the federal budget for fiscal 1960 were too high. He said that he believed the government was spending too much money and that these expenditures should be reduced to the lowest possible point.

—HE REITERATED the position he and secretary of State John Foster Dulles have taken that a reduction in the Chinese Nationalist forces on Quemoy would be desirable from a military viewpoint, but the United States had no intention of attempting to dictate to an ally.

—HE DISMISSED criticism of his World War II strategy by Field Marshal Montgomery on the grounds that the Allies won the war in far less time than originally expected or estimate even by such authorities as former British Prime Minister Winston Churchill. Montgomery had said that Eisenhower's world war strategy had prolonged the defeat of Germany.

Link 'Fat Cat' Financier To Atlanta Temple Blast

Atlanta, (AP)—A high-up "fat cat" backer of anti-Semitic terrorism figured today in police investigation of the $200,000 dynamiting of the Jewish temple here.

This financial angel of a fanatic hate-mongering ring was mentioned in one of two letters seized as police raided the homes of five persons held for questioning about the early Sunday outrage.

DETECTIVE Capt. R. E. Little described the other paper as a penciled draft of a letter addressed to an Atlanta Jewish leader before the temple blast.

It said:

"You will soon witness a terrifying experience."

The detectives did not say precisely where either letter was seized, whether the one to the Jewish leader was ever mailed or what the leader's name is.

The other letter, Little said, was mailed from Arlington, Va., just before five men were arrested here in July for an anti-Jewish demonstration in front of the Atlanta Journal-Constitution building.

"Thanks to one man, one 'fat cat' financier, we can now do the things we've been planning to do," it said.

The letter did not identify the "fat cat" but Little said the name of a man once prominent in public affairs has turned up repeatedly in the bombing investigation.

The letter referred to the wealthy backer as having "put his dollars where his mouth is—God bless him." It also mentioned a "big blast" and added:

"The boys from New York will be coming down. There's no guts in the local citizens."

The officers said they are attempting to locate five men other than the five already held. They said an unidentified sixth man, resident of Detroit, Mich., was subjected to questioning "when he began to spout off" while in jail on another count.

Little said a "veneer of arrogance" evident at the start of the grilling of those held is beginning to wear off.

"We are getting down to business now," he reported.

THE DETECTIVE captain listed the fifth man arrested for questioning as Wallace H. Allen. He said Allen and George Michael Bright, 35, also held, helped plot the temple bombing at a meeting in May.
